Movement

ENCOUNTER

With The FUTURE

I HAVE NOT ENDED the story for there is no end. This Movement is alive, it is growing, it has already become a part of our life as Americans; it is joyous, still a singing movement, still one full of compassion and love; and being so, it is flexible, amenable to the best our minds and hearts can offer it. Amenable also to the worst we offer it. A brave vigorous movement that is here to stay: rich with infinite creative possibilities, potent—and dangerous, for the potential good can be distorted and lost by the despairing restlessness of those from the ghettos who have no hope, and who are too uninformed historically, too unsure emotionally to analyze current conditions or foresee the consequence of their acts. We, as a people, could be confronted soon by a series of catastrophes. Whether this happens depends on the wisdom of responsible Negroes but more, much more on what every responsible white American does next. One thing is certain in a plexus of uncertainties and that is, our encounter with the future cannot be evaded, it must be met by both the artist and the scientist in us, by our deep intuitions and our rigorously proved knowledge—and by the human being in us, too, that creature who knows the power of compassion, the potency of a strange love that keeps reaching out to bind one man to another.

Encounter With The Future

Foreword

PAT WATTERS, a senior staff member, has written for the Southern Regional Council this inquiry into the thought and influence of certain American youth. These are people who have given both direction and depth to the struggle for civil rights.

The record will show, I believe, that the Council by its Special Report of February 25, 1960 was among the very first to welcome and value the sit-in Movement begun by Negro students of the South. In a sense, this pamphlet is a sequel to that 1960 report, for if that expressed faith this expresses respect for a Movement that has since served and in no small measure inspired this country. It still serves and it should, in sum and despite misadventures, still inspire.

IT used to be so wonderfully simple. Here were these Negroes and they were right. There were those segregated lunch counters. In an age of ambivalence, of moral ambiguity, the Negro Movement gave us at last a choice, as clear-cut as a sit-in, between good and evil. It let us have the cake of certainty and eat it too, by frosting it with forgiveness, non-violence, love.

It is not that simple any more.

Of course it never really was, and we never had any right to add that to the impossible demands we have made on Negro Americans, however they might have encouraged it. Two years ago, the catch-phrase was "new militancy," and I remember a Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) veteran saying then: "It's not new. We've been militant—and angry—all along. It was just that nobody bothered to ask us."

No single phrase can catch the mood now. Most of the negative elements—internal dissension, disorganization, alienation, the Communist question, dispute over attitudes toward whites and toward America itself—have been there all along. So have the seeds of new and positive elements (beyond the old bravery and dedication): whole new concepts of methods and goals; a new thrust toward causes, rather than symptoms, of social sickness. Now it is time to bother to ask about all these things, precisely because the comforting oversimplification of the sit-ins is gone forever. It is time to look at the Movement with something like human expectations, and, perhaps, with compassion, and to try to understand some of the real depth of the struggle between good and evil that is, indeed, its profound meaning for America.

This is a look at the youthful wing of the southern civil rights Movement, for as always it sets the pace. SNCC is the key, but also involved are much of CORE (Congress of Racial Equality), and of SCLC (Southern Christian Leadership Conference), and the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) insofar as they reflect or react to the same radicalism. Throughout the report, references to the Movement are in this rather loose sense.

This is not an "insider's" report. It doesn't pretend to anything like omniscience. If there was once a time when anyone not a worker in one of the four chief civil rights organizations might nevertheless develop an "insider's" knowledge of the Movement, that time is no more. No longer can a reporter measure the mood of the Movement by talking to a few key people. Often now it is difficult to be sure who the key people are, and difficult sometimes to evaluate what any people tell you. The best one can do from the periphery is to talk to as many people as possible, observe as much as possible, and try to think it through. The effort is important.

Communication by the youthful wing about itself has always been in action more than words. Where the issues are crass, as in a sit-in, nothing more is needed. Where they are not, as at the Democratic National Convention in 1964, communication either breaks down, or is on a level difficult to perceive. Very few people in the nation understand what SNCC was trying to say with its action of opposing the political compromise offered at the convention. Its efforts to explain in words weren't successful. It has always had a disdain for the efficacy of words spoken to an audience outside its own circle. Perhaps this is because the context in the circle is so terribly different from that of any audience outside it.

Nevertheless something was communicated by the action at Atlantic City. It produced circles of negative reaction to SNCC that have been widening ever since, and these negative reactions have prompted the many examinations of radicalism and other realities of the Movement, like this study. These may, finally, find out what SNCC was trying to say at the convention, or more of what it has been saying all along. If so, one must still jerry-build his own understandings.

A beginning is to try to understand better the COFO Summer of 1964.

Gains and Losses

This was the campaign concentrated in Mississippi by the four civil rights organizations, SNCC, CORE, SCLC, and the NAACP. They were banded together into a Council of Federated Organizations (COFO). COFO had its origins in earlier futile efforts to register Negro voters. The Mississippi Summer was the first large-scale coordinated effort of the four organizations, and it may be the last.

Any appraisal of it has to be with awareness constantly of what the workers were up against, simplified in these grim statistics from the New York Times: 1,000 arrests; 35 shooting incidents, with three persons injured; 30 homes and other buildings bombed; 35 churches burned; 80 persons beaten; at least six persons murdered.

COFO operated 47 Freedom Schools and nearly that many community centers, worked on voter registration and developed the Freedom Democratic Party (FDP). It brought in upwards of 1,000 volunteers, many of them white northern students. They were a presence from the rest of the country and were psychologically effective, if not in inhibiting racist murderousness, then in calling attention to it. Lawyers, doctors, and church people from afar similarly served.

Immediate tangible results were few: a very small success in fiercely resisted registration; the attraction to the Movement of a relatively few Negroes who are very faithful, giving them tastes of real learning and equalitarian association; the attraction of many more (80,000) in the less risky role of FDP voters; the election of a very few Negroes to the U.S. Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service county committees.

The most impressive tangible result was not evident until nearly a year later. A major goal of the Summer of 1964 was to develop an indigenous Negro leadership. By the following Spring of 1965, virtually all of the COFO projects and activities were in the hands of indigenous Negro leadership.

COFO claimed many intangible results on the morale of Negro Mississippians and in awakening political consciousness. Perhaps even more, intangibly, was done for white Mississipians. They saw integration in action. They learned how far from the rest of the nation they stood, and how much they have become despised for this. Since the Summer, they have showed the first signs of change, and hope. Moderates are speaking out. McComb ceased public sanction of racist terrorism. The Mississippi Economic Council, a state chamber of commerce, called for law and order, communication between the races, "impartial administration" of voting laws, and support of public (desegregated) education.

A number of pressures, including economic, were behind this. Also in the background was successful court-ordered desegregation of three school systems in August, abetted by a state-wide organization of white liberals and moderates known as Mississippians for Public Education; enlargement of the FBI forces in the state; continued federal court suits against segregation; continued exposure by the national press of racism and thought control in the state; and passage of the Civil Rights Act. COFO had its impact on all of these.

In 1964, nothing much could succeed in its specific, announced goals. What COFO helped so much to do was to force Mississippians to confront themselves and their problems, and the nation to confront Mississippi. COFO's success has made obsolete this strategy.

Unstructured shaking up of Mississippi's peace—agitation for the sake of confrontation—has not the same necessity as it had last Summer. The new federal poverty program should be given a chance to work; school desegregation should continue smoothly; white moderates and liberals should be given a chance to gather themselves together.

COFO seems aware of this. A big adjustment for many of its workers is the shift to poverty program work, community development, agriculture committee work, Title Six compliance. Many have left for other parts of the Black Belt. Like pioneers, some freedom fighters get restless on yesterday's frontier. The unexplored territory of racism is rapidly diminishing and where pockets of it yet remain—in Alabama, Louisiana, or northern suburbia—they call out to be seen and tested.

Not that Mississippi is tamed. The enlarged FBI force shouldn't leave. Neither should the effort to work at the deep levels of poverty and racist persecution. Nearly all of the Negro population is yet to be registered to vote.

The gains of the COFO Summer were not without cost to the southern Negro Movement. The effects have lingered and are an influence as the Movement prepares for another long hot Summer. Stress last Summer brought dissension to the surface—more than ordinarily—among member organizations of COFO and its allies. At the end of the Summer, the Mississippi NAACP voted to withdraw, a generally unpublicized action.

During 1964, the NAACP and SCLC had participated only nominally in COFO. CORE, on the other hand, had contributed one-fifth to one-fourth of the trained field workers. The rest had been SNCC, and the volunteers. As 1965 came in, it became clear that COFO was to be almost entirely SNCC, or that it was to become a self-directing organization, fraternally related to SNCC.

Indeed, the Mississippi theater had become an organizational complex. During 1964, three lawyer's groups were active in providing defense council for COFO, with the heavy duty work being done as always by the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund and its cooperating attorneys. There was also a new group—the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee. Finally, there was the National Lawyers Guild, which was close to COFO leadership, but with which the Legal Defense Fund will not associate, and which LCDC held at a distance. A fourth group, generously financed and with ties to both the American Bar Association and the Mississippi bar, appeared during 1965: the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. A further change is that LCDC has become sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The legal achievement in Mississippi is one of impressive results. The appearance of so many "outsiders" practicing law in behalf of Negroes upgraded standards of justice. Prosecutors needed more than the color of a defendant's skin for a conviction that would stick. Appeals have been started on interrelated cases involving habeas corpus and transfer to federal courts which may eliminate or curtail harassing arrests of civil rights workers on baseless charges.

Involvement of doctors, an auspicious development, and of the church in the COFO Summer was less contentious and will probably continue. The Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches is an apparently permanent program with a $400,000 a year budget, and a program paralleling COFO's generally, though with missionary overtones.

After withdrawing from COFO, the NAACP announced its own Mississippi program. If COFO was SNCC's great opportunity to lead the Movement structurally, it failed. At least for the present, the most youthful part of the civil rights Movement is still only one part. Nevertheless, the SNCC approach—living and working with the people—is established in Mississippi and southwest Georgia and by CORE in some parts of Louisiana, and is being put into practice by new exponents, including SCLC. This could be crucial to the future of the Movement. Hitherto, SNCC's virtual monopoly on this kind of sustained work has been its chief strength, and the source of its radicalism. It remains to be seen whether other organizations can do the kind of job SNCC has done, and, if they can, whether it will have the same radicalizing effect on them.

One SNCC innovation that has not been adopted by other elements of the civil rights Movement is the Freedom Democratic Party. The FDP envisions extending out from Mississippi, and envisions offering its own candidates across the Black Belt, refusing to make "lesser of evil" choices. This, amid much criticism and sincere misgivings about SNCC's leftism, is a chief factor in the widening of a breach between SNCC and the so-called coalition of civil rights organizations, labor, and the rest of the liberal establishment. The NAACP and organized labor this Spring in Mississippi, for example, joined forces to block an effort to get national accreditation for an FDP-developed Young Democrats organization.

But SNCC's radicalism also is manifest in two other of its directions. First, SNCC has always been an endless, introspective conference, toiling away at defining itself, its ideals, its aspirations, its plans. As it has grown, it has vacillated between bringing non-staff into its "conference" or excluding them. Its policy now seems to be to confine the conference within the staff, and between staff members and the Negro dwellers in rural and urban slums. There is a formalization of the latter in SNCC's announced plans for "People's Conferences."

Second, SNCC's persistent iconoclasm throughout early 1965 in saying, over and over again, that passage of the Voting Rights Bill is of considerably less importance than unseating of the Mississippi Congressional delegation is important for insights it provides. Liberal forces will pass a voting bill. SNCC refuses to say "thank you" and has itself given the effort only left-over energy, maintaining that the major problem—enforcement—is still not solved. Instead, it will demand of liberal forces that they do something which they probably will not do: unseat the Mississippi delegation. It is the SNCC style. If the great demonstration planned for Washington during the Summer of 1965 in behalf of the Congressional challenge comes off, its true importance will be that its target—actual if not announced —will be liberals.

Amid all the dissension around it last year, SNCC itself apparently underwent serious and traumatic internal struggle.

A perhaps symbolic issue seemed to be disagreement over how SNCC should be organized. (The "coordinating committee" has from the beginning been preoccupied with forms of organization, just as it has been supremely disorganized, the latter a part of its style which probably costs more than it is worth, and, when necessary, as with organization of the short wave radio in Mississippi or the FDP convention, can be abandoned immediately. In the internal convolutions of its forms of organization, which seem always more and needlessly complicated, it often seems, maybe consciously, to be parodying the over-organization of our age.)

The dispute this time seemed to be over whether the loose but at least structured organization of the past, with a defined executive and administrative function, should be supplanted by an arrangement of local and perhaps even personal autonomy. James Forman and John Lewis, two of the top officials of SNCC, led the former view, Robert Moses the latter.

In a sense, the issue was state's rights (local autonomy), and the area of discontent much the same as Senator Goldwater tapped. And—despite the harm done by reactionaries to a legitimate idea—discontent with over-organization and meaningless form is one of the profound mass emotions of the time.

The ostensible issue was resolved at a seven-day annual meeting this Winter, with those in favor of organization over local autonomy prevailing. The decision was probably influenced by a three-month period of near anarchy in SNCC just preceding. The meetings of SNCC in the past year have become for members apparently a particularly upsetting experience, with emphasis on letting everybody speak, so that they are overly long and emotional. This reorganizational meeting was of this pattern. Its most important achievement was to complete the transition of the organization from one of student and community groups to one of individuals working as organizers. The staff workers emerged as the power base, with frequent staff meetings promised. Apparently in deference to local control, the executive committee was selected almost entirely from among Negro Mississippi staffers. But on a practical level, the executive committee functions little. Decisions are made in the offices in Atlanta, or, just as often, by local leaders in the field. It is never simple.

Distrust of organization continues a strong influence in SNCC, and one needs to understand this. Mr. Moses, the Harvard mathematics major who began the SNCC work in Mississippi four years ago, personifies this instinct. To escape the mantle of revered leader and prophet that settled on him in Mississippi, he went to the length of changing his name and moving to Alabama. He is now Robert Parris.

Throughout recent SNCC literature and conversation, opposition to the very concept of national civil rights leaders is a strong theory. This is part of the intensified dedication to working with and through the people. Big leaders weaken the will of the people to think for themselves, SNCC argues. The real task is to develop decision-making ability among the people, and leaders from among them.

In much of this, the term alienation is inescapable. At times, it seems to be SNCC against the world, and divided against itself. Willy-nilly, it cuts a swath of lost friends and uninfluenced people, many of them white liberals. In one locale where the local newspapers are bad beyond belief, the one completely competent, honest, and fair-minded newspaperman on the scene has come to despise SNCC. He has no good word for it. He could have remained a useful friend. This kind of thing is behind the drop of the voice, and even intonations of sorrow, almost pity, when people who are genuinely friendly to SNCC start telling its flaws.

The alienation reached a crisis at the Democratic National Convention last year and the scars and enmities linger on from FDP's refusal to accept a two-seat compromise of its demand that all the FDP delegation be seated. Some SNCC people insist this was not necessarily a rejection of the concept of compromise, but rejection of an insulting, unsuitable compromise, that an earlier proposal to seat anyone of both factions willing to pledge loyalty would have been accepted. Nevertheless, to those oriented to the give and take of politics, and the cloaks and daggers of sinister motivation, the FDP decision and SNCC's heavy influence on it had to be either hopelessly idealistic and unrealistic, or diabolically designed to confuse the masses of the Negro followers, to stir them to needless discontent. To SNCC, everybody from the President on down had "sold out." Perhaps it is well that 1965 and 1966 are not particularly big political years; they may be a breathing space during which the political breach within the Movement and with the liberals may be healed.

Viewed as a third party effort—as many in SNCC do view it—FDP might not gain as much power for itself as its backers think, but it could take crucially needed power (in the Black Belt and the Negro ghettos of the North) away from the liberals to the benefit of the right wing.

In the initial stages at least, FDP seems contenting itself with the role of being a separate wing of the regular Democratic Party in Mississippi. In Georgia, Julian Bond, public information officer of SNCC, jumped into a reapportioned House of Representatives race, running as a Democrat. The opting is in, for the time.

SNCC's unwillingness to settle merely for registering Negroes, its plans to run its own candidates, can be at least partially understood by looking at the areas in the rest of the South and nation where there is Negro enfranchisement and something less than an equal society. Atlanta comes to mind. An interesting study might be made of the impact of Atlanta, the headquarters of SNCC and SCLC, on radicalism and awareness of sad realities in the southern Movement. Again and again, when they cite evils of tokenism they want to avoid in the reformation of the Black Belt, the Movement people use illustrations in Atlanta: the manipulation in the past of the Negro vote by conservative Negro leadership in coalition with moderate whites; tokenism in schools, annually exacerbated by policies increasing housing segregation and the growth of a ghetto; hypocrisy and cynicism summed up by what critics contend is the city's regard for its national image for good race relations but not for the human victims of racism. One needs only to see what the Movement believes about the South's "most progressive" city to understand its pessimism and intransigence in other parts of the South.

Southern liberals look askance at FDP with slightly different perspective from those in the North. They regard as dangerous its tendencies to solidify and continue a racial alignment in southern politics, leaving both major parties still in the hands of whites, and discouraging effective political alignment of Negro voters with white moderates or liberals.

(The FDP idea began with mock elections in the Fall of 1963 as a demonstration of disenfranchisement. Somewhere between then and Atlantic City, some began to think of the demonstration party as simply a party. Interestingly, the first mock election originated the idea of involving white college students in the southern struggle, thereby arousing the national concern over their safety that never came for the safety of Negroes in general, or the small bands of full-time civil rights workers. The students who worked in that election, as did later the Summer volunteers, went in with their eyes open to this aspect of their role. The sad rationale behind it was demonstrated anew during Selma when the death of a Negro civil rights demonstrator in Marion was largely ignored by the public—though fully covered in the press—while the later murders of two white civil rights demonstrators caused a great storm of national indignation.)

By demanding a stronger repudiation from the Democratic Party and its liberal supporting forces of the unholy alliance with racism in the South since Reconstruction, the FDP shows a new face of the Movement, less willing to forgive and forget. It raises a question not satisfactorily resolved by either World War II or the Civil War: is unconditional surrender the way to deal with the people behind a social system with which there can be no compromise? About the system there is no question; but what of the people?

For all its inherent dangers, FDP forces us also to examine a cherished rationalization. Politics is the art of the possible and of compromise, but neither of these is necessarily a virtue, and we still have a responsibility to examine the possibilities and set limits to compromise.

Because it was so long and so hot, the Mississippi Summer was reported in column inches far better than any other civil rights campaign. But the coverage nearly all centered on violence, partly because of circumstance, partly because of the Movement's and the press's own fixations. This is a dilemma. The Movement and the press both know that what the public responds to is turmoil and violence, even though other important things might be happening and even though the great violent upheavals haven't bettered appreciably the lot of the Negroes immediately involved, as an examination now of Albany, St. Augustine, and Birmingham would show.

The important things that were happening in Mississippi during the Summer of 1964 were the reaching to the grassroots of Negroes, the forcing of change on the white population, and development of political consciousness in the Movement. And these were reflections of the very important effort of the Movement to adjust to the new realities of its role. But violence made the news.

SNCC for a time seemed trying to move out of the violence dilemma in Selma. But when it did agree to demonstrate, it did so in a manner that seemed deliberately to provoke violence.

This illustrates one of the more strained tensions, more precarious philosophical balances, within the Movement—the reconciliation of deliberate provocation by Negroes of the close-to-the-surface violence of an element of whites in the South with the true spirit and high meanings of non-violence. Often there is a frank admission by a civil rights worker that to him, as an individual, non-violence is only a tactic, not a way of life, or a way to a better life for the world. The simple act of demonstrating, no matter how orderly and dignified, was often in the immediate past, in parts of the South, a provocation to violence. In more sophisticated sectors and the present more sophisticated time, when the mere presence of a demonstration fails to provoke violence, demonstrators have jeered, taunted, and otherwise, short of actual violence on their part, brought it forth. There are also elements in this of a grim game to see who will "chicken" first, a simple release of hostilities. The cynicism that begins with considering non-violence as simply a subtle sort of weapon would seem to justify this next step to make it effective. It is only another step, too, to the use of violence itself, where tactically feasible. But at its best, non-violence never sought, as no human should, deliberately to goad the beast in a man. The question—and the answer is really not known—is whether America has ever responded to the higher meaning and hope of non-violence, or whether it has simply reacted to violence and turmoil, acting in civil rights matters only as necessary.

New and Old Radicals

The introduction of white volunteers in great numbers to the existential reality of the southern race struggle was another most important aspect of the Mississippi Summer. To white Mississippians, this was the unkindest cut. COFO's popularity rating would not have been improved if all its followers had worn

Brooks Brothers, or had constantly fawned and bowed and made that elbows-in shuffle of self-abnegation common to an older generation of deep-South Negro men. But by the beards of the Summer volunteers, and the hanks of their women's hanging down, uncombed hair, they offended to the soul nigh onto a state-full of whites. These were people who voiced no noticeable storm of popular protest over murder of COFO workers, but who, on the subjects of unkemptness, beer drinking, white and Negro dating, racial and sexually mixed sleeping arrangements, and, most of all, beards, howled in holy and moral and righteous indignation. They really believed at the beginning that a horde of Communists and beatniks were coming to rape and pillage. They were relieved that racial revenge was not so reaped, but they remained convinced about what constituted the horde. The horde did little to convince them otherwise.

COFO attempted to organize poor whites in Gulfport, but in most ways, seemed to write off the whites in Mississippi en masse. If the Goldwater vote (more than 90% of whites) may be regarded as a headcount on racism, then COFO was probably right. Yet, as the grip of totalitarianism in the state slips a bit, one remembers the accounts of how the overtures of moderates and liberals to the COFO volunteers were rebuffed. "They lectured us, and wouldn't listen," one liberal told me. "They were so dogmatic."

One remembers the account of how in the one town in Mississippi where there was a hope of engendering sympathy and respect from local whites, the volunteers came with arrogant disdain, and promptly alienated the town.

It was of course murder that these kids felt they faced. They were scared all over Mississippi.

A professional man took a look at the worst of human failings among the volunteers under the terrible pressures of the Summer, and concluded that the patterns of behavior did not differ from the norm for a similar group of young Americans anywhere, in far less stressful situations, for example, on a college campus.

The consensus among those who saw the volunteer operation being formed and in motion is that the majority of the white volunteers were not the way-out variety of campus radicals, but were mainstream, middle-class young Americans, highly motivated not so much by intellectual or neo-beatnik philosophical instincts, but by the standard religious, patriotic, and political ideals of the mainstream. Even severest critics of COFO say this, adding that the effect of the Mississippi Summer was to radicalize such youngsters considerably. One has but to read the thoughts and feelings of these white volunteers in a compilation of their letters home (Letters from Mississippi, edited by Elizabeth Sutherland) to see the truth of both propositions. They were radicalized not just by SNCC, as the critics contend, but by the conditions they encountered in Mississippi, the same radicalizing forces that had been at work on SNCC for five years.

I asked Aaron Henry, the Mississippi Negro leader from Clarksdale, if any more strenuous efforts would be made in the future to screen out "oddballs." "Oddballs!" snorted Mr. Henry. "They ain't nothing but oddballs. Coming down here to get scared to death and shot at just to help us Negroes. They're not typical Americans. They're oddballs all right. The right kind." An impeccable moderate summed them up another way: "They are good and dedicated and absolutely right. But there is a harshness and cynicism to their idealism. They're the kind of way-out people I could never get along with when I was in college."

The issue of the beards (and the philosophically inaccurate but semantically correct epithet, "beatnik") goes deeper than race; it is part of the age-old antagonism of young and old, the old against the new. The new young rail against many of the same things the beatnik movement did, in oversimplified sum the values and compulsions of the atomic-age industrial society, but they are not "beat," not impotent.

Less obviously, the young as a class have been only a little less powerless than Negro Southerners. When the latter, out of desperation, finally forged a lever to power, the young jumped to get a hand-hold, too. The lever since has been used in campus protest across the country. Reaction there has been more civilized and realistic than in Mississippi, but the methods have been criticized and the question keeps being put: is this a Communist infiltrated thing?

Mississippi racism didn't ask the question; it knew—and has cried over the years—that it's all a Communist plot. The Mississippi Summer saw more responsible people taking the question seriously. This was fed by the FBI assertion that two out of every seven of the volunteers had "connections" with organizations listed as subversive by the Justice Department. The only names mentioned were not of Communists but off-spring of Communists. A month after this disclosure, the FBI at Jackson was refusing to discuss it at all.

A frank discussion with SNCC leaders is about the least comforting follow-up on the question. Certainly, they say, we don't worry about the past or present political affiliations of anybody. If they are for what we are, which is merely to make America do what it says it believes, we accept them. How can they hurt us or the country? Julian Bond of SNCC told me a couple of years ago in one of the earlier, smaller of the recurring panics over the question, that "Sure, if a guy comes in here and says he wants to work and then the first thing he says after that is, 'I'm a socialist,' we probably wouldn't take him. Not because he's a socialist, but because he must be hung up on politics. We'd do the same thing if all he talked about was, 'I'm a Republican.' "

One acute observation is that in the usual refusal of SNCC people even to discuss the Communist issue, there is denial of their most cherished ideals, the civil liberties of those who are genuinely concerned about it. It is anti-anti-Communism as dogmatic as extremist anti-Communism. One SNCC spokesman answered this, and in a sense confirmed it, by saying that people who had to discuss Communism had nothing relevant to talk about, that they were really worried about something else, namely, the radicalism of the Movement. A Mississippi Negro, not of SNCC, who pointed out that the mass of Negroes there don't worry about Communism because they don't know what it is, echoed the answer when he said, thoughtfully: "Radical ideas are not necessarily Communist. Maybe it's time for radical ideas."

SNCC seems to say it is simply uninterested in the ideological clash between Communism and democracy, that it is not pertinent in the existential reality of the personal clash with racism. What they seem to be saying is that nothing can be worse than what they fight, so why bother with these minor battlings so long as the major one remains unresolved?

While the Negro Movement and the campus movement feed each other, it is probably accurate to say that the campus movement draws more heavily. SNCC is its model organization. The COFO Summer "snickized" the volunteers, and they took this back to the campus. But the campus radicalism is less single-minded and hence more revealing about politics. Even a brief reportorial sorte into this world of student radicalism reveals an unknown little theater of power battling and bewilderingly shifted values, definitions, assumptions. "Oh, don't worry about the Du-Bois clubs," said an intimate of this world airily about the California-based organization that openly avows Marxism. "They are Russian-oriented, and hence for peace," and added: "And therefore to the right of SNCC." The term Maoism is flung around; often, as in a long interview with an entirely pragmatic student much dismayed by his Summer with COFO, it is used not to describe an ideology or organizational tie, but merely a frame of mind. The structured, ideological Maoists in the country, meanwhile, are coming out into the open, so it seems important to keep the distinction clear between actual and metaphorical Maoists.

SNCC with other elements of the Negro Movement came together formally with the campus "new left" Movement in demonstrations against American policy in Viet Nam. Interest in such matters as foreign policy is not new in the Movement; part of it, in the past, when the Movement's chief obstacle on civil rights often seemed the federal government, probably reflected a tendency to sympathize with other lands embroiled with this same federal government; if the emphasis now is stronger on such matters, this may in part be due to the fact that the new audience is more interested in such matters. Part of it, inescapable, too, is that the Movement probably tends to identify with the people in a place like Viet Nam, North or South, because of race, because of poverty. The first poster against U.S. policy in Viet Nam I ever saw was in the COFO office at Jackson. In SCLC, a strain of pacifism has always accompanied emphasis on non-violence. (One doesn't get the feeling that the Movement thinks out such foreign policy stances, however, with the same thoroughness and continuity that it gives to race relations.)

The searcher for subversion in the Mississippi Movement finds immediately in Freedom Schools and Community Centers, among other randomly received donations of literature, the damning little stacks of such publications as the People's World, West Coast party organ; Freedomways, a Marxist magazine; the National Guardian, Chinese-oriented; and the Crusader, published by Robert Williams, formerly a Monroe, N.C., Negro militant, now in Cuba. A sample of his approach: "The weapons of defense employed by Afro-American freedom fighters must consist of a poor man's arsenal. Gasoline firebombs (Molotov cocktails), lye, or acid bombs (made by injecting lye or acid in the metal end of light bulbs) can be used extensively. . . . Hand grenades, bazookas, light mortars, rocket launchers, machine guns, and ammunition can be bought clandestinely . . ." Strange literature for the non-violent coordinating committee, though certainly not reflective of program.

Everyone always says there are no Communists in positions of influence in the Movement. How they know this is hard to say. Clearly there is no reason why some skilled undercover man couldn't become a leader; indeed, in SNCC, such a fellow would seem to have found a perfect set-up.

The point is that nobody really knows; nobody produces proof of anything, and the legacy of McCarthyism (and the upsurge of HUAC won't help) has created such an absurd context that it is almost impossible to think logically within its framework. The Maoist mind—formally connected or informally operative—would seem to be an enemy of all the Negro Movement has stood for in the past, and it is this, intellectual positions, not old and ineffectual Reds still living in the 1930's, that should be our concern and that of the Movement. (Or perhaps our concern should also be psychological types: "What really worries me," said one astute observer, "is the number of psychologically suspect characters around now.")

Of interest to some observers is the rapid change that occurred in FDP leadership. The FDP was created in the Spring of 1964. Its early leadership included some of the most prominent, established Negroes in Mississippi. By the Fall of 1964, these people of stature were mostly gone, replaced by youthful SNCC militants or figures drawn from the impoverished masses. Legal representation by a nationally known attorney, close to the Democratic Party and to the AFL-CIO, had been exchanged for that of a group of lawyers which includes men who are themselves targets of Communist accusation. There are unsinister explanations for all of this, and part of SNCC's strength is its refusal to compromise its beliefs; it opposes the House Un-American Activities Committee and, therefore, tends to be protective of those whom it attacks. Part of SNCC's style is its willingness to affront middle-class, including middle-class liberal, values and concerns. These qualities can be respected, though they may reflect immaturity as well as radicalism. At any rate, the FDP—particularly an enlarged FDP—because its business is politics and the business of politics is power, causes especial concern to those who have witnessed its development.

The attempt to make judgments on the Communist question, as is frequently pointed out, in the light of 1930's and 1940's concepts is an exercise in unreality. This may mean that there is developing a redefinition of what is respectable on the American left—with SNCC and the campus radicals setting the limits and beyond, and forcing America back to some of its pre-McCarthy intellectual freedom.

The investigation we should be making, then, is not one in the McCarthy style, as seems inevitable with the dangerous reinvigoration of HUAC to "investigate" the Ku Klux Klan. (The Klan is about as relevant to what remains wrong with the South as the Cosa Nostra is to the real sickness of New York City.) The investigation that should be made is within ourselves to determine what in the new radicalism supports and promises to strengthen our heritage of democracy and freedom, and what in it is subversive in itself of these.

The red scare among liberals and moderates is not so much the fear that the Negro Movement will some morning deliver America into the hands of the Russians or the Red Chinese. What is feared is the kind of betrayal that so hurt the labor movement in the 1930's and 1940's, particularly in the South, by Communists or by those opposed to labor who seized on Communism as a way to discredit it, depending on your view of that history. The fear is that the Negro Movement and its great hope of a truly integrated society will be similarly betrayed, become tainted in the mind of the mass of the public, and lose the popular support that it needs to achieve its goal. (The question of whether its true goal is achievable where such a fear is possible is a paradox whose implications need facing.)

The red scare these days is akin to the paralyzing fear of the far right that haunted us when Senator Goldwater ran, possibly as groundless now as then. It is a fear founded largely on propaganda and image considerations, the likelihood that if one sure-enough Communist is found in the Movement the great American middle will become disenchanted with the racial revolution, and then turn to the right. The new radicalism tends to react on this same image-conscious level, saying that if concessions must be made to the witch-hunt and hysteria-prone streak in the American mentality, then this in itself defeats the goals of the Movement.

Neither view seems to come to grips with the genuine conflict that exists between the goals of the Movement and the political system of Communism, which is the legitimate concern. It is, in any revolution, considering the sad history of most of them, relevant to raise and to continue to raise the question of ultimate values which are at stake—support of the traditions and institutions in America and the West which assert and protect human rights and freedom, representative government, respect for truth, and concern for the individual, as opposed to dehumanization and totalitarianism in any form, including Communist.

One of the main questions that SNCC and the new radicals raise within the Movement is whether it is fruitful any longer to work within the framework of the liberal's problems—his desire to achieve the Movement's goals and his fear of both Communism and the far right. The question as more often stated is whether it is fruitful to try to work within the framework of the liberal establishment and society's institutions as they now exist.

What alternative does SNCC think it has? Blowing up bridges? Howard Zinn, a white college professor who has been in the thick of things with SNCC since its beginnings, and has written a book about its meaning and mystique, describes one route that many of the influential SNCC people take seriously. It is the notion of parallel institutions, of which the Freedom Schools and the FDP are the first going examples.

The idea, as explained by Dr. Zinn, is to have something in between the people and the established institutions. You prod the institutions to do better; they fail; you set up parallel institutions to serve needs, set standards, and prod the institutions harder.

The idea, Dr. Zinn said, has its roots in both anarchist and trade union socialist theory. It marks a return to these old radical streams and a flowing together of them. Distrust of government had been abandoned in the 20th century in favor of the power of government—by the Bolsheviks in Russia, by the trade unioners in the New Deal.

As early as the Spring of 1963, Dr. Zinn urged in a speech to SNCC that they keep the centers of popular power they were creating outside the existing institutions. Para-government is indeed revolutionary, he points out. It could include local governments. (In Ruleville, Miss., last Winter, a SNCC field worker told a mass meeting of plans for a mock election of city and county officers. "We'll elect a mayor and he'll be a mayor. I mean he won't really be a mayor, go down there to city hall and all. . . .") As Dr. Zinn points out, this is the kind of thing you do when you are setting out to overthrow an existing government, or—as is the case—to transform it.

Over against SNCC's distrust of existing institutions is the thinking and persuasion of Bayard Rustin who urges a continuation of the coalition of labor, the churches, liberals, and the Negroes which marched on Washington, got the civil rights bill passed, and elected Johnson. The Negroes cannot win alone, he points out; poverty cannot be ended without drastic new measures (massive public works); coalition is the answer.

SNCC people attended a trade union luncheon in Atlanta at which Mr. Rustin spoke eloquently on these ideas. Afterwards I asked them what they thought. "Look at that lunch," was one answer. It had consisted of cocktails, a crab meat souffle, sufficient for most lunchers, a heavy roast beef course, three vegetables, salad, and for dessert, flaming baked Alaska. (The hosts had ordered and paid for a good-sized lunch, but a lesser one than they got, through the generosity of the chef, an old Czech socialist, who apparently believed that nothing is too good for the working class. Nothing is simple.)

Much of the widespread concern about the youth wing of the civil rights Movement can be described as merely SNCC's normal effect on a new audience. Certainly little of the radicalism is new. It may be stronger, deeper, now in such an organization as SNCC, and the new audience may be more preoccupied with such matters. But I remember in 1963 listening to SNCC workshops on the evils of Wall Street and the sickness of all American society, but listening with half an ear, for these were side issues to the main fight then against public segregation.

Robert Moses, six months before Atlantic City, made a speech warning against accepting the first compromise liberals came along with. He also talked then about the need to open a new frontier, of freedom of association, and also said then that those who accused SNCC of trying to wreck the two-party system just couldn't admit that the two-party system wasn't working, that to do what really needs to be done on race, a national administration would have to destroy knowingly its chances of winning the next election.

An important thing for this new audience to know about SNCC is that it has its eye on power. This was evident when it—after much debate three years ago—chose the quiet drudgery of voter registration over more spectacular avenues of expression, and it is not merely evident but becoming effective now in the grassroots community work and political organization. A SNCC veteran of the southwest Georgia work described it: "One of the basic assumptions of SNCC is that you get nowhere without power, and the most effective and meaningful power is grassroots political power, organized and cohesive. . . . I have the feeling too that it is more important to concentrate on city council elections than on the presidential elections. On top, the issues become obscured. There is dilution of top policy through things like the war on poverty. We don't need to lobby when we have power. We don't educate people. We help them express what they know. They know what is needed. We show them how to get it."

Thus, three main elements of SNCC are its willingness to work with the people and know their lives, its determination to put these people into touch with power, and its concern with the forms of organization.

The youth wing knows what the good reporter knows—that the greatest truth is not in abstractions but what exists in the given situation, and it's never simple. "Tell it like it is," they say, summing up at once the perhaps fatal fault of much of our communication—from Congressional debate to news coverage to the best seller list. They live with the people they want to help. This is, besides the hell of racist oppression, living in the culture of poverty with all the dislocations that implies.

Here is a white, formerly middle-class SNCC youngster on some of the cultural differences: "There is less value on big words and academic distinctions. This is from their lessons of survival. They don't see the difference in the guy who says, 'Sorry we have no vacancies,' and the one who says, 'We don't hire niggers.' The result is the same. They don't differentiate between the superior court and criminal court, or the county jail or city jail. They're all bad. It doesn't matter whether it's the FBI or the sheriff. The important thing is they're white and they're against you."

What such youngsters know of racism and poverty is known in their guts, the same kind of knowledge out of which Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, the symbol of the FDP, speaks. It was Mrs. Hamer who set something dangerous aloose at the Democratic Convention, an emotionalism in the credentials committee that threatened pre-arranged plans, and made a floor fight unthinkable. She disturbs people. They laugh at her and others like her, disparage them, dismiss them. "They do not," said a middle-class Mississippi Negro, "represent me. They don't help the Negro's image. They might illustrate certain of our problems in education." A white minister in the state, referring to FDP's elevation of poor people to leadership roles, said the problem was already too many ignorant people in political power.

But when Mrs. Hamer tells of her and her people's suffering, she is eloquent in a way that most of us who are smoother and better educated cannot be. She speaks to the emotions; like good blues, her voice tones and images cut through to something responsive in us, and we feel and understand and are, for a moment anyway, angry along with her. "Somethin' got to break," cries Mrs. Hamer. "They jes' keep on sayin' wait, and we been waitin' all of our lives, an' still gettin' killed, still gettin' hung, still gettin' beat to death—Now we tired waitin'!"

All of the more than 50 long books written out of the long hot Summer say no more. Perhaps what upsets people about her is that they recognize in her a threat that is older and more menacing than Communism: the wrath and the power when the persecuted cross a line which says life itself is not dearer than end to the persecution.

Increasingly, it seems clear that one of the great reappraisals America needs to make is its attitude toward the relevancy of the dispossessed of the nation, and the earth, of what they feel and what they say. This involves, as some have put it, the debate of the Federalist Papers all over again.

America's poor, we are beginning to learn, have their own distinct culture, and it is far less like the dominant culture of the nation than it is similar to that of the other poor of all the other nations. This distinct culture of poverty isn't pretty and is not to be romanticized, but it does have its good characteristics and strengths, and some of these are the very characteristics whose lack, glumly, we are told cripple American culture and its people—for example, ability (or, among the poor, necessity) to live in the present moment instead of forever in the past, mulling it over and rationalizing it, or in the future, planning it and fearing it. Anyone who comes into surface contact with this culture of poverty, however peripherally, comes away impressed with these positive qualities—from Tolstoy to Oscar

Lewis. Yet those who—in various states of alarm—contemplate new trends in the Movement usually fail to see the healthy potential in the new notion of putting many people from outside the culture of poverty into it, to live it. The poor, they seem to say, are not blessed with anything we need. But why can we not learn from these people, get some of the energy of their strengths into our own culture, a revolution of fiber more than of form, instead of allowing their strengths to be destroyed when, hopefully, we destroy poverty?

SNCC's involvement with these people may form a Gestalt that will, as direct action did five years ago, sweep away many objections which, taken one by one, are entirely valid.

Who Are the Alienated?

And there are plenty of these.

The controlling—almost the entire—ideology of the youthful militants, apart from the handful of adherents of DuBois Clubs and other such disciplined groups, is still a literal acceptance of the copy-book ideals of American democracy. Their charge against America is that we have despised our own inheritance, have alienated ourselves from our ideals.

The full-hearted agreement with American ideals is balanced by an angry disillusionment, amounting at times to cynicism, about the institutions and processes of American society. To understand this alienation is to understand the kind of life the field workers endure, the special world of psychological and physical danger they live in. An uninitiated white can enter just the edge of this world for just a few days and (though the situation isn't the same because Negroes have bought with pain better defenses) he comes out endlessly angry, distrustful, and more than impatient with those who can remain unconcerned about its evils. The irrationality of the reaction is that of the returning front-line soldier's to the essential frivolity of civilian life. It is an over-reaction, but the assessment of the realities of both the hell at the front and the frivolity back home are valid. The over-reaction can be hard to take. A disenchanted volunteer told of a fellow white in the Movement who said to him: "The trouble with you is that you don't wake up every morning like I do, hating America."

Dr. Robert Coles, the Harvard psychiatrist who has studied the psyche of the southern Movement with exquisite and erudite sympathy, has written in the November 1964 issue of Psychiatry a study of the worst effects on the full-time workers in the civil rights front lines. He makes the point that they must fight distrust and fear from Negroes as well as white racism. He describes resulting irritability, hopelessness, loss of energy and terrible fatigue, and says: "They are clinical signs of depression. They constitute 'battle fatigue.' They indicate exhaustion, weariness, despair, frustration, and rage. They mark a crisis in the lives of those youths who experience them, and also one in the cities which may experience the results, translated into action, of such symptoms."

He goes on to suggest that the psychiatric profession can be helpful to their most difficult effort. This is the effort to maintain the "delicate equilibrium" of "trying to keep their courage and initiative while accepting the often sour lessons that come with growing older and living through unexpected and dismaying experiences. They must keep their moral initiative, maintain their ethical resolve, yet somehow avoid succumbing either to depression as an inward expression of frustration or to disorganized rage and anti-social behavior as equivalent outward forms."

We have avoided such truths about the southern Movement's most deeply involved workers, blaming them for symptoms caused by the insanity they fight, like blaming a man battling a mad dog for getting his trousers torn. So have we been willing to accept the whole rationale of non-violence without daring to look behind it for what our knowledge of human beings will reveal. Such super-goodness and saintliness in an individual, we know, is often the mask for murderous rage that is so great he dare not show it, even, or most of all, to himself.

This, then, is the background for understanding stories like that of a youngster who two years ago I watched in one of the most beautiful exhibitions of personal, gentle loving of white taunters the Movement has known, but who during the Mississippi Summer saw one beating of a Negro too many, and screamed for weapons; the background for hearing a gentle and sensitive young man of the Movement talk with dispassion, if not satisfaction, of how Black-Belt Negroes hate whites so much that it may end in the killing of women and children; the background for understanding the sullenness, distrust, sneers, and condescension with which civil rights fighters can greet outsiders.

But there is a great danger to the individual, the Movement, and the nation in translating the insight that Mississippi represents the worst in all the nation and its history into a belief that Mississippi is the nation. Dr. Coles, in tracing an emotional cycle common to many new civil rights workers, describes a final "philosophical" adjustment where they become able to relate what they experience in the hell of racist oppression to all of life, instead of abstracting it as the meaning of life.

Too much integrity can be a neurotic paralysis. You can become so right, so uncompromising that you no longer are able to function in this wicked world.

From Radicalism to Racism?

SNCC's penchant for disorganization has to be counted among the same kind of liabilities. Disaffected Summer volunteers called it debilitating. The press is constantly confounded by it.

It goes beyond unanswered phone calls and unpredictable actions. During last Summer there were at least three different, opposing theories current, discussed, and activated about the function of Freedom Schools. They were never reconciled. Until one understood this, and no one explained it, it was impossible to make much sense out of the many COFO publications and pronouncements about this vital program. The full propaganda value of these schools, as the elaborate demonstrations that they were of the unutterable condition of Mississippi education and the desperate needs of Negro children there, was never fully realized. Does the nation know about these conditions and needs yet, in their full, horrible meaning?

Yet another weakness of the youth wing in general is the tendency that has always been there to a certain snobbishness that is not so much racial as it is a matter of whether you've been where they've been. On one level, it is almost a cult of suffering.

But these are as nothing to the most hurtful and hurting danger to the Movement, and that is that Mississippi may after all win—not by murder and intimidation, but by the spread of the contagion of racism.

There are signs to see in the southern Movement and among the masses of people to whose grievances it gives voice, signs long evident and ignored in the North. At the mass meetings, the effort is still made (though sometimes not) to say "white segregationist," not just "the whites," when anger and bitterness come pouring out. But in private conversations, it is the man, the white man, Mister Charlie, all-inclusive. The old plea, seldom ever heeded, to the white Southerner to take each man on the basis of his worth, and not his race, incredibly, surrealistically keeps coming to mind in conversations with people of the Movement. The possibilities for success of terrorism against whites is a topic for informal discussion. Hatred often shows in eyes, in words, deeds. That it is earned hatred is not the point. It is lamentable not so much in the light of the reality Negroes face, but in the light of what the southern Movement first promised and sought—which was a suggestion of a way out of all the trap of hostility and fear in the nation, and the world. The suggestion may never have been realistic or even right, but it was a mustering of will to try to find some new truth out of all the old good truths that are preached in the Negro churches, and the inability to muster such will for survival is one of the modern world's most frightening characteristics.

A white tells himself after an encounter in the Movement with reverse racism, "Well, it probably did him good to be able to say that, and me to know how it feels." But this would be a pitiful and puny way for the Movement to end, the Movement that marched the beautiful Negro people of the South to the edge of something better than America has yet known, and let them, and us along with them, see the Promised Land, and begin to believe in our hearts that we could get there.

(We speak of the beautiful. There is so much we could learn. I talked with a fat and creased-face Negro woman who was housing white COFO volunteers in a little Mississippi town, and she told me about her husband, how before he died, back last year when he was sick, he had gone down to the mill and gotten some scraps of beautiful cloth, yellow and red and orange and green, and had brought them to her and told her to make a quilt of them, so that when he was gone, she could spread it on her bed, and when she got in it at night, she could think of him. We can't even talk about beauty like that. It embarrasses us.)

There are still many on both sides of the color line who have not given up getting to the Promised Land. If we are to concede that, all along, the Movement ideal of non-violent, religious, redeeming love was better than America deserved, then we can begin to realize that the amount of vitality still behind the ideal among Negro Southerners is remarkable.

We can also begin to sort out the phenomena that fall short of the ideal. John Lewis, the quiet, always polite, utterly fearless chairman of SNCC, made a much whispered-about speech in the privacy of the Winter reorganization meeting which, in effect, said that whites were welcome but that the Movement "must be black controlled, dominated and led." (If you're not black, get back.) He tied this to "the fact that we are caught up with a sense of destiny with the vast majority of colored people all over the world who are becoming conscious of their power and the role they must play in the world."

Bayard Rustin makes the distinction between such identification with Africa (Mr. Lewis and other SNCC leaders had recently returned from a visit to Guinea) and black nationalism, saying the former can be entirely healthy, and I recall a year ago listening to Mr. Lewis tell two African visitors that SNCC was as much against black nationalism as segregation, because they meant the same thing.

Robert Moses in a speech a year ago put the identification with Africa in a perspective that clarifies its meaning. He was arguing that it is fallacious to compare Negro Americans with other immigrant groups who have succeeded in the country. The Negro American, he said, does not come from the European community and tends to identify with the African community. And neither America nor the world has progressed to the point where there is a community big enough to include both. The reason for this, he seemed to be saying, is white exclusiveness, white racism. Another Negro leader, on a more earthy level, seemed to be getting at the same thing, chuckling as he did: "We're still trying to figure out if the white man's soul is worth saving."

It has also been suggested that what might on the surface appear to be reverse racism in the Movement might in reality be based on more pragmatic stratagems, part of the infighting between distinct types in such an organization as SNCC, with race irrelevant—in a sense, a manifestation of real integration. Interestingly, whether significantly or by chance, the alignment is often white women against Negro men.

Antagonisms were common between white Summer volunteers and the old-line Negro civil rights workers and, to a lesser degree, their followers. There was fear and resentment, the feeling that better educated, more articulate whites were moving in and taking over. "Look at those fly-by-night freedom fighters bossing everybody around," a SNCC veteran summed up the feeling during Selma. The clash was more cultural than racial, and all too human. Some of the northern whites probably were insensitive to the beauty and strength of the Negro people with whom they worked. Others, however, were overwhelmed by these qualities, talking lovingly of them long after they got back home, and, ironically familiar to a Southerner, expressing love of the landscape and atmosphere and the soft, slurred speech of the South itself.

August Meier, professor of history at Roosevelt University, has suggested in a perceptive paper on the types of "true believers" in the Movement that the antagonisms are largely ones of class and orientation. Broadly, this was, before the Mississippi Summer, the resentment by lower class religious Negroes of the South of middle-class and high-achieving Northerners with beatnik, radical, and other intellectual orientations. He takes some hope from the fact that during the Mississippi Summer another type of middle-class northern youngster was coming into the Movement, one deeply committed to religious and national ideals, the same that motivate the lower class Negroes.

There is of course irony to the fact that it was this entrance of the mainstream into the white wing of the Movement which prompted the most widespread concern in the nation about intellectual and political postures of the Movement. Such concern would better have been expressed a few years earlier insofar as the whites of the Movement are concerned. It is also worth noting that after its single Summer of encounter with this mainstream of white volunteers, SNCC moved to de-emphasize the role of volunteers and of white staff members.

Class antagonism—the reaction of middle class Negroes to the COFO and Delta Ministry bias against any but the poorest being leaders—was, as much as anything else, behind a serious schism in the Greenville, Miss., Negro community during a May 1965 effort to get jobs integrated.

Racism remains the enemy. If it really does infiltrate the southern Movement, the danger and damage will be far greater than if Communists should. If we are really convinced of the threat of either—racism or Communism—then our concern should not be to punish and destroy, or to lop off the most radical arm, but to find the ways to strengthen the Movement against both. For these were our bravest and best Americans trying to achieve overnight with action the goals of the bravest and best of American thought. If we lose them, we have indeed lost.

If these youth, as vital a part of the Movement as they have been, do show signs of alienation so deep that they are in danger of being hostile to all of America, we should be mainly worried about why. It does no good to keep repeating that the answer is to get rid of the evils in the South that have so alienated them. We keep fighting to do that, and not without success.

We can't just dismiss SNCC either, call it crazy or Communist, and forget about it. For SNCC's genius, from the sit-ins on, has been to put its body where truth is.

In the middle of an obscene Fourth of July racist "patriotic rally" in Atlanta last year, with Ross Barnett and George Wallace inflaming a crowd of lower-class whites from all over the South, SNCC sent into the grandstand full of hate a white girl in company with three Negro men. The truth of the patriotism and civilization there showed immediately as the crowd shrieked and gangs of men attacked the three Negroes, beating them over the head with heavy folded metal chairs. (SNCC was of course criticized later for provoking the savagery of that mob.)

The truths that SNCC with its bodies seems to be seeking now are in the realm of ideas. "Do I really want to be integrated into a burning house," James Baldwin asked two years ago and we whites have been talking about it ever since. SNCC, by hesitating outside the door with its bodies, makes us do more than talk. It forces us to try to come to grips with what Baldwin says. Are we, indeed, a burning house?

A whole range of other ideas—from the frequently bewailed way we have crippled representative government to the legacy of McCarthyism—are similarly being translated by SNCC from abstract to emotional understanding. On the campuses, such high-flown concepts as academic freedom and the noble meaning of a university are getting similar treatment.

In the past, the Movement was right in its moral position on segregation, and its militants were right about the tactic of direct action. SNCC and other elements of the Movement may not be right at all about many of the political and social issues they are raising. But the tactic seems as valid as ever if it forces us to do more than talk about these issues, if it forces us to the kind of emotional understandings we must have if our thinking is ever to be more than sterile. Desperately, our thinking needs to be creative and capable. Because things won't ever be simple again.

Julian Bond Faces Voters Again Today

AC 2/23/66

By BILL SHIPP

Rep.-elect Julian Bond, who has been voted on five times since last summer and hasn't taken office yet, will be voted on again Wednesday—this time in a special election to fill the House seat which his would-be colleagues denied him Jan. 10.

Bond is a sure winner; he has no opposition. He also has almost no chance of being sworn in after he is elected. Under a House rule change adopted in closing hours of the General Assembly Bond can not be sworn for 10 days after the special election. In the meantime, the rules committee will pass on his qualifications and is almost certain to bar him.

Bond said, "If they bar me again, I'll sue them again." He already has a suit against the the state on appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court now.

Trailed by a network television crew, Bond was busy Tuesday trying to persuade some of the 6,600 registered voters to leave their homes in the 136th District and go downtown to the courthouse Wednesday to vote. The courthouse box will be the only voting place open.

SOME QUESTION

There was some question Tuesday of just how much support Bond would get from any drinking constituents. Because of Bond's opponent-less election, there won't be a drop of liquor or beer sold legally within a two-mile radius of the courthouse.

The same holds true for the entire 136th District, although no ballots will be cast in that area. Atlanta police say that's the state law regarding the election and they plan to enforce it.

BETTER HOUSING

Bond, denied his House seat because of his anti-draft and anti-war statements, took time out from electioneering Tuesday to lead a group of seven slum residents of the Markham Street area to the Atlanta Housing Authority to seek funds for moving into better housing.

M. W. Rush, tenant relations supervisor of the Housing Authority, told the group that public housing is available to them, but there are no funds allocated in the housing authority for moving them.

"It seems to me it's the city's responsibility to move these people in view of the fact they do not adequately enforce the housing code," Bond said. Most of the Markham Street residents live in homes placarded as being violation of the city housing code.

WHITE MAN'S TRICK

Asked what he thought of the withdrawal of support of him by the American Civil Liberties Union and the disclosure he has hired two "far left" lawyers, the 26-year-old Negro said: "Just another white man's trick."

He said his constituents have told him: "First they make us vote downtown. Now they're calling you a Communist." Bond said he tells them, "That's right."

The ACLU withdrew Sunday from the Bond case after he brought in two New York lawyers, Victor Rabinowitz and Leonard Boudin, who are registered with the Justice department as agents of two foreign powers — Communist Cuba and the government of Kenya.

TO CARRY VOTERS

Bond said he thought that disclosure had been made because "some people are interested in seeing a small turnout for the election." The 26-year-old Democrat said he will spend election day driving one of a fleet of cars hauling voters to the courthouse.

Meanwhile, a salesman for the ACLU said Tuesday that the organization has received solid support from its membership of its decision to withdraw from the Bond case.

But Howard Moore Jr., Bond's lawyer and brother - in - law, said several individuals told him they were "chagrined" by the ACLU decision.

Moore also said: "Leonard Boudin has sworn under oath that he is not and has not been a member of the Communist Party or the Young Communist League."

In addition to representing the interests of Fidel Castro in this country, both Rabinowitz and Boudin are active members of the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee (ECLC) and the National Lawyers Guild.

Rabinowitz has been a member of the executive board of the National Lawyers Guild, described publicly by the House Un-American Activities Committee as a Communist front organization which has come to the defense of "known espionaged agents."

The ECLC also has been cited by two congressional committees as a Communist front.

"Just because a lawyer represents a murderer doesn't make the lawyer a murderer," Bond said in commenting on the affiliations of his two new advocates.

Bond won the Democratic nomination in a primary last year. He then took on a Republican opponent in the general election and won again. He suffered his first defeat when an ad hoc committee of the House voted to recommend that he not be seated. His second defeat came when the House voted 184-12 to keep him out.

And a three-judge federal panel voted 2-1 to uphold the House's action. That decision is under appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Paper was discovered in A.D. 105 by the Chinese Ts'ai Lun, but took centuries to reach the West. The Arabs captured some Chinese papermakers about the year 700 and soon began using paper rather than vellum or parchment. DR. KING ASSAILED FOR SLUM TACTIC

Takeover of Building Stirs Wide Chicago Opposition

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, Feb. 24—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and his civil rights group Thursday ran into a hornets' nest of opposition for their assumption of control of a West Side slum building without authorization from the owner or a court.

Threats of legal action came from several sources while judges, lawyers and real estate officials blasted the takeover as illegal.

Dr. King had announced yesterday that he was taking over the six-flat building and would collect the $400 a month paid by its tenants and use the money to clean and renovate the dilapidated building.

He conceded that his action was supra-legal—above the law—but contended the morality involved outweighed legal aspects.

However, the possibility that the scheme would fail loomed late today. The Cook County Welfare Department announced it would withhold rent money provided to two welfare recipient families in the building if it was not paid to the owner of the building.

This sum totals $155 a month and would reduce to $245 a month the rental payments that Dr. King said he would spend on the building.

Legal Action Looms

But this amount also is under attack by a spokesman for the First Mutual Savings Association, which holds a mortgage on the building. He said legal action would be instituted if mortgage payments of $150 were not kept up.

A spokesman for Dr. King had said he doubted whether there would be enough left from the $400 to make mortgage payments.

Furthermore, John D. Bender, 81-year-old owner of the building, conferred with his attorney, Fred B. Raskin, about legal action against the civil rights groups. The lawyer said an announcement of their intentions would be made tomorrow.

Adding to the complications, the city filed suit in Municipal Court charging that 23 violations of the city building code existed in the slum structure. A court hearing on that matter was set for March 9.

In the midst of uncertainties about whether they would be able to collect rent money from the building, the civil rights groups who took it over said they had contracted verbally for $600 worth of electric wiring. A private scavenger also was engaged to haul away accumulated garbage and other refuse.

Dr. King said today that Elijah Muhammad, leader of the Black Muslims, had assured him that "all of his followers would be in sympathy" with Dr. King's campaign against Negro ghetto slum.

In a telephone interview from his Chicago flat in a West Side Negro slum, Dr. King told of a 45-minute meeting with Mr. Muhammad last night in his 19-room Tudor-style brick mansion near the University of Chicago.

The upshot of the agreement was that, "the time has come when we, the Negroes, must see our mutual problems," Dr. King said, "it is not the time for us to be fighting each other."

NEW CHIEF PLANS WIDER CORE AIMS

MOVEMENT

McKissick Will Attack Bias Against White and Indian

NYT 3/2/66

By PETER KIHSS

A new "Phase Two" for the militant Congress of Racial Equality opened yesterday. Floyd B. McKissick, a lean North Carolina lawyer, took over as national director with plans for new leadership training and an attack on social inequities for whites and Indians as well as Negroes.

James Farmer, a CORE founder in 1942 and director since 1961, said the organization's "strategy of creative tensions" — its freedom rides, "jail-ins" and other demonstrations — had compelled Federal action, for gains in the South. But in the North, he said, de facto residential and school segregation was actually increasing.

"We could have moved into the heart of the ghetto sooner than we did," Mr. Farmer mused at CORE's headquarters, 38 Park Row. "Had we made such a move four years ago, I think the Harlem riots, the Watts riots might have been prevented."

"We might have been much further along in having a motivated and organized Negro community in the North, to throw its weight around politically," he continued. "Only two years ago, most of our chapters were outside the ghetto—middle-class, working for the ghetto. In the past two years we have reached out of the churches and the schools into the streets—to the street gangs, gin joints, pool halls."

Symbol of Change

One symbol of change is Mr. McKissick's hunt for a home in Harlem for his family. Mr. Farmer, new head of a national anti-illiteracy drive for which $875,000 in first-year funds is being processed by the Office of Economic Opportunity, has lived in an integrated middle-income project at 165 Park Row.

CORE's "Phase Two," Mr. McKissick said, aims to "train first of all chapter leadership" in local communities to take advantage of existing laws and programs. One effort will be to seek policy-making positions on antipoverty boards.

"For everybody, not only for black people," he said, CORE will support labor in pressing for an increased minimum wage and repeal of the Taft-Hartley Law's Section 14(b) that now allows the states so-called "right to work" laws. But Mr. McKissick added it would also "jump on labor for its discriminating" in blocking Negroes from joining certain unions.

Half of Budget Raised

CORE has raised half of a record $950,000 budget for its fiscal year ending May 31, 1966, Alan Gartner, retiring community relations director, said. In the last fiscal year it collected $812,973, exceeded only by the $886,354 in fiscal 1963-64. It has held its top total of 80,000 contributors, and has 140 chapters, with 60 more in process of affiliating, for 6,000 so-called "hard-core" members.

The new phase will include political drives. Mr. Farmer campaigned for Mayor Lindsay last year, although CORE's only formal endorsement in the mayoral contests, he said, had been for Representative William F. Ryan's unsuccessful bid for Democratic nomination.

Ex-Aide to Dr. King Appointed State's Expert on Urban Negro

Walker Helped to Organize Alabama Demonstrations —He Promises 'Action'

NYT 3/2/66

By MARTIN ARNOLD

Governor Rockefeller yesterday appointed the Rev. Wyatt Tee Walker, former aide to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., as his special assistant for urban affairs.

He said that Mr. Walker, a 36-year-old Negro, "will become the latest member of a team we are shaping up to tackle the multiple problems" of Negroes in urban areas.

Recently Mr. Rockefeller, who has said he will seek re-election this year, appointed Jackie Robinson, the former baseball player, as his special assistant for community affairs.

Mr. Rockefeller said at a luncheon for Mr. Walker, attended by 40 persons, at Frank's restaurant, 315 West 125th Street, in Harlem, that his new aide's first task would be to coordinate plans for two-year technical colleges the Govenor has proposed for Harlem, the Bedford-Stuyvesant section in Brooklyn, Buffalo and Syracuse.

Mr. Walker will receive $75 a day in his new assignment, and will remain as president of the Education Heritage Corporation, a private corporation in Yonkers that publishes the Negro Heritage Library.

Decries 'Platitudes'

In accepting the appointment, he said that he shared with the Governor "the conviction that the people of the area to which I will be giving primary attention have had enough social studies, political speeches and pious platitudes to last a lifetime."

"They want action, and that's what they're going to get," he said.

Mr. Walker is a tall man who wears black horn-trimmed glasses and neat conservative suites. Yesterday he had on a dark gray pin-stripe suit and a trim gray and white tie.

Mr. Walker served as executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference from 1960 to 1964, and took part in civil rights demonstrations in Albany, Ga., and Birmingham and Montgomery, Ala.

In Birmingham, in 1963, his wife, the former Theresa Edwards, was struck on the head by a police gun butt, during a demonstration, but was not seriously injured.

It was Mr. Walker who suggested in 1963 a program of civil disobedience to block the movement of trains, planes, buses and automobiles in all parts of the country. This was to protest the killing of four Negro children in the bombing of a Birmingham church and two others killed in subsequent violence.

The New York Times

The Rev. Wyatt Tee Walker

For a time, Mr. Walker served as interim minister of the Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem. Representative Adam Clayton Powell, pastor of the church, reportedly dismissed him last September in a dispute over whether Dr. King should be welcomed in the community.

Mr. Walker said yes and the Congressman said no, according to that report. Mr. Powell was not available for comment yessterday.

"The problem of the inner city is starkly real and not academic," Mr. Walker said yesterday. He urged that all the forces of the Federal, state and city governments be used "to create a synthesis of action that will produce actual and visible changes in the inner city where hopelessness and frustration are so compounded."

Walker's Task

Saying that he hoped to "serve as the arms and voice of my community," Mr. Walker indicated that he would work on the problems of de facto segregation, medical facilities, job opportunities and narcotics traffic.

The Governor said that his new aide would hold community meetings to discuss the construction and curriculum of the two-year technical colleges. Mr. Walker will also open an office in Harlem.

Mr. Walker was born in Brockton, Mass. He received his bachelor of science degree from Virginia Union University in 1950, and his bachelor of divinity from its graduate school three years later.

Before joining Dr. King's movement, he was pastor of the Gillfield Baptist Church in Petersburg, Va. He joined Educational Heritage in July, 1964, and became president last September. He is the father of four children. The family lives in Yonkers.

DR. KING IS SUED OVER TENEMENT

Owner Asks Court to Halt Civil Rights 'Trusteeship'

3/5/66

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, March 4—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was sued in Circuit Court today by the owner of a slum building taken over last week by the civil rights leader and three organizations of his followers in a self-proclaimed "trusteeship."

John Bender, the 81-year-old owner of the South Side building, asked the court to prohibit Dr. King from collectng rents or otherwise interfering with the property, to make Dr. King account for any rents already collected, and to appoint a receiver for the building.

Judges, lawyers and real estate officials had criticized Dr. King and the civil rights groups for taking control of the dilapidated building.

Dr. King had called the move "supra-legal" but had contended that the morality involved was more important than legality. He said the $400 a month rent paid by tenants would be used to clean and repair the building.

Pleads Inability to Pay

Mr. Bender charged in his suit that Dr. King had directed the tenants to pay him or his agents the rent that were due the owner. Without this money, Mr. Bender said, he will be unable to make payments on the mortgage, taxes and insurance on the property.

Mr. Bender also said he would be unable to carry out his responsibility to correct 23 building code violations cited by city inspectors.

"Ever since the announcement of Mr. King's supra-legal trusteeship, we realized that legal action would have to be instituted to stop this illegal seizure of private property," said Fred B. Raskin, counsel for the owner.

"Although we agree with the intentions and objectives of Mr. King's actions, we believe it can be accomplished under the jurisdiction of the courts. Under our form of government, law is just as important as civil rights. Mr. Raskin said.

He noted that the owner's voluntary request for appointment of a receiver was unusual because receivership generally comes about through action by the city. City law spokesmen said the alleged building code violations did not warrant a request for receivership by the city because they did not include any major structural deficiency.

CORE MAN FACES NARCOTIC CHARGE

Harlem Chairman Is Seized Picketing Police Station

N YT 3/4/66

By PAUL L. MONTGOMERY

The chairman of the Harlem chapter of the Congress of Racial Equity was released without bail yesterday upon arraignment in Criminal Court on a narcotic charge.

The civil rights leader, Roy Innis, and nine other members of CORE were arrested Friday night while picketing outside the West 135th Street stationhouse. All were charged with disorderly conduct when they refused to walk inside an area designated by the police.

The pickets were protesting an incident two weeks ago in which a white patrolman allegedly ordered a 30-year-old housewife to partly disrobe in the back of a Harlem bar.

When the arrested pickets were searched, the police said, Mr. Innis was found to possess two hypodermic syringes and 44 capsules of "a barbiturate."

The 31-year-old chairman, a medical technician at Montefiore Hospital in the Bronx, said the implements were used in research work and that the "barbiturate" was actually tranquilizers and antibiotics for his wife.

The nine other CORE members were arraigned in Night Court on Friday and released without bail for a hearing next Friday. Mr. Innis was arraigned yesterday morning in Weekend Court and assigned a hearing on the same date.

The CORE protest arose from an incident on Feb. 20, when four white policemen—a captain, a sergeant and two patrolmen—entered Joe's Place at 449 West 125th Street to look for transvestites. Several men in women's clothing had been arrested there the night before.

One of the patrolmen allegedly ordered Mrs. Gertrude Williams, a mother of two, to go to a kitchen at the rear of the bar and "prove she was a woman."

On Monday night, CORE picketed the West 126th Street stationhouse, where the four men were assigned. The men were subsequently assigned to other precincts pending the outcome of an investigation by Police Commissioner Howard R. Leary's confidential squad.

In their protest on Friday on West 135th Street, the CORE pickets demanded an independant civilian review board and the assignment of Negro captains to all Harlem precincts. Yesterday an "emergency" meeting was held at CORE headquarters, 307 West 125th Street, to determine further action.

Mr. Innis, a native of the Virgin Islands, moved to Harlem as a teen-ager and has headed the local chapter of CORE since last fall.

Plywood Group Picks Aide

John D. Ritchie has been appointed regional vice president of the American Plywood Association. Mr. Ritchie will assume the new post in Washington April 1. He will be succeeded as director of the information services division by George C. Cheek, now the assistant director. Mr. Ritchie will be concerned with such matters as government procurement, government controls and inter-association cooperation.

Less Talk and More Action Seen in Student Protests

By TOM GREENE

A Louisiana educator predicts that demonstrations by militant civil rights groups will become "more aggressive" as their frustrations increase.

Dr. Irwin Berg, a clinical psychologist and dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Louisiana State University, said here Tuesday there probably will be "less talk, more action on the part of groups like the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, if they are unable to get quick results through the usual means of protest."

Dr. Berg was speaking on identity and student protest on the final day of a seminar for newsmen on the problems in higher education. The seminar was sponsored by the College Entrance Examination Board to establish a dialogue between educators and newsmen.

STUDENT PROTESTS, which Dr. Berg said are nothing new, are "largely an outgrowth of their dependency status."

But "there is a new element in the dependency status of today's college students which goes beyond the financial and psychosocial dependency of the past. In our affluent, automated, increasingly populated world the American student is essential as a consumer but not as a producer" unless there is a war.

"As a result," Dr. Berg added, "he is frustrated and, as is usually the case with frustration, he indulges in aggression. He rebels, riots, protests and forces the world which ordinarily dismissed him lightly to take him seriously for a while. Thereby he restores what is essential to every human being, a feeling of personal worth."

Dr. Vivian Henderson, new president of Atlanta's Clark College, said the predominately Negro institution still has a vital role to play in spite of growing desegregation.

While Negro colleges enroll about 3 percent of the nation's college students, Dr. Henderson said, they educate about 60 per cent of the Negro students nationwide and probably more than 90 per cent in the South.

THESE SCHOOLS "continue to be the only source of education for many Negro youths," Dr. Henderson said.

"America, of course, needs all the educational sources it can muster to meet the demands," he added and the predominately Negro colleges and universities will continue to be important sources to meet these demands.

Dr. James Edmondson, president of Judson College in Marion, Ala., told the newsmen that the small, independent, church-related college also will play a big role in meeting the increased demands for higher education, but said these private colleges are "running out of money and they are running out of time."

Shift Urged In Drive For Rights

MOVEMENT 3/10/66

The Civil Rights Movement must place its emphasis on human relations instead of civil rights, Georgia's executive director of the National Conference on Christians and Jews said here Wednesday.

Speaking to a luncheon meeting of the Hungry Club, Don McEvoy said that even though there are many civil rights battles still to be fought, the main emphasis of the movement should be on the fundamental task of building a new order of right relationships.

He also emphasized the importance of having the movement move from "protest to politics."

Speaking on "The Future of the Civil Rights Movement," McEvoy listed the following five dangers facing the movement in the future:

1. The danger of not being able to adjust to new situations, 2. The danger of seeking security through cynicism; 3. The danger of not being able to decide whether we really want "in," 4. The danger of assuming the job is done and doesn't require eternal vigilance; and 5. The danger of growing disillusioned too quickly before the new programs have a real chance to be tested.

U.S. Blocking Action Against Rights Leader

AJ 3/17/66

By WILLIAM B. WILLAMS

Copyright, 1966, by The Atlanta Journal

The Justice Department in Washington has clamped a muzzle on local federal law enforcement officials to prevent them from taking action against a prominent civil rights worker, The Atlanta Journal has learned.

The newspaper has just concluded a month-long investigation in which government officials in Washington and Atlanta and civil rights workers themselves were questioned.

One local federal officer told a reporter that employes of his agency here were "sick at the soul" because of what they consider to be high-handed tactics by the Justice Department.

NONE WOULD speak on the record. They were afraid of losing their jobs. But three sources high in the federal government said, in separate interviews, the following:

The Federal Bureau of Investigation here is concerned about one stolen car, at least, which had keys that were kept by Hosea Williams, a top attache to Dr. Martin Luther King.

The FBI and the office of Charles L. Goodson, U.S. district attorney here, wanted to bring charges involving the prominent civil rights leader, Mr. Williams, but were told to lay off by the Justice Department.

The Justice Department sent from Washington two attorneys, Alfred E. Moreton and Frank J. Cunningham, to prosecute two men, Harold Belton Andrews and Morris Findley, for the theft of a single car.

The FBI and the district attorney and his staff were told to keep quiet about the matter involving stolen cars that ended up in the possession of persons involved with the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

THE PERSONS involved paid for the cars. How much they paid and what the circumstances were is a secret known only to the persons involved and the high brass of federal government.

The investigation by The Journal extended from the offices of the Justice Department in Washington to the racial ghettos of Atlanta.

Many would not talk. Some made guarded comments. But three men of officialdom, their faces drawn, quietly closed the doors of their offices and told their stories.

"I've been fighting this thing since November, and I'm sick at the soul to think what our country is coming to. Today it is auto theft. Maybe tomorrow it will be murder," one official said.

"I have to presume Hosea Williams is innocent. But believe me, it is a matter for a jury to decide. Not the Justice Department in Washington," another official said.

"Don't let them tell you this isn't a cover up. They are covering up for civil rights groups that seem to be getting bigger and stronger than the United States government," another said.

All said they would not admit anything publicly because of their jobs.

All had thought that somehow the Justice Department finally would come through and permit local federal officials to do what they consider is their duty.

BUT ON a Monday, March 7, without any fanfare, a federal grand jury here returned an indictment against Harold Belton Andrews and Morris Finley, a printer who turns out work for SCLC.

The indictment was curt. It charged that Andrews and Finley transported a stolen 1965 Dodge Dart from Arlington to Atlanta. It did not say what person the car was stolen from, nor did it give the serial number or motor number.

Efforts to obtain this information failed. An FBI spokesman in Washington said he could not locate the information and the newspaper should call the local FBI office. The local FBI refused to discuss anything about the case.

The Justice Department in Washington had been called more than a month ago to determine whether Hosea Williams was involved in an investigation concerning stolen cars.

THERE WAS hesitation on the other end of the line. And Jack Rosenthal, top information specialist for the Justice Department, said he did not know how to answer such a question. He said if there were any developments, he would inform the press.

After Andrews and Finley were indicted, attorney Cunningham was telephoned at the Justice Department in Washington. He was asked if SCLC workers were involved in charges of possession of stolen cars and why he and Mr. Moreton were called into the case. It is rare for Washington attorneys to come down to Atlanta to handle an auto theft case.

Mr. Cunningham referred the call to Carl Belcher of the Justice Department. Mr. Belcher would not talk to the reporter, but told his secretary to refer the call to public information.

Mr. Rosenthal said he could not comment on why Washington attorneys were handling an auto theft case in Atlanta. He said that out of fairness to the defendants in the case, he could not discuss the matter.

Finley, who was indicted on the charge of transporting a stolen car, is president of Diamond Printing Co. His small shop in a seedy section of Cain Street was visited.

Finley said he feels that he is faced with the possibility of being forced to take the rap for something he did not do. He told a reporter that most of his business comes from SCLC and that he would rather "rot" in prison before he implicated SCLC.

He said that he had met a man he considered a used car dealer and bought a car from him. He said he used the car in his business. It was a 1965 Dodge Dart. Later, he said, he rights workers were detained, withdrew its charges against Andrews.

Trooper Miller said the license plate on the car had been stolen from an Augusta woman, Mrs. Della D. Armstrong.

He said the plate had been stolen from her Ford.

Hosea Williams told a Journal reporter he had no idea the car was stolen and that only one which subsequently proved to be stolen was involved in operations. R. T. Blackwell, program director for SCLC, acknowledged that "one or two stolen cars" had been connected with SCLC and "an investigation is being made."

HE ADDED that Mr. Williams was in charge of buying cars, and Mr. Williams had the bills of sale on the questionable cars notarized. He said SCLC and Mr. Williams never bought a car unless they believed they were dealing with a car dealer.

Mr. Williams said Mr. Hankinson had thought he had proper title to the car. He said that Mr. Hankinson left town on a mission and had left the car "at home" and turned the keys over to Mr. Williams.

The SCOPE leader said he had given the keys to the civil rights workers to participate in the demonstration. He added that Mr. Cave was incorrect if he told law officers that the car had been bought for SCLC.

Mr. Finley charged that some government men used pressure to get him to "lie" about SCLC. He said SCLC and Mr. Williams are innocent in all of their dealings.

Mr. Finley signed his own bond, which was $1,000, and is free until the case comes before a federal judge.

He said that before learning this, he had introduced some "influential" people to the man. He said these people innocently dealt with the man. He added that he would not give the name of the "dealer."

Harold Belton Andrews, indicted along with Finley, has not been arrested. Officials at the U.S. marshal's office said they had sent the warrant to Macon. Macon officials said Andrews had not been located.

For more information, The Journal checked officials in DeKalb County. The county police had nothing on Andrews, but the sheriff's office did.

A WARRANT for his arrest, charging him with taking a car, was sworn out Sept. 25, 1965, by Hertz Corp.

Andrews was charged with taking a car rented from the Hertz Corp. at 40 Auburn Ave. NE. It was a Chevrolet, Impala, four door with engine number 164395a127033.

Max B. Barrett, manager of the Hertz branch office, said Hertz did not want to prosecute the case.

An employe of Hertz, however, said the car had been discovered in Madison, Ga., in the possession of civil rights workers.

Sheriff W. H. Knight of Morgan County said he remembers the arrest. The workers, headed by Peter Cave, were charged with driving a vehicle with improper registration, he said.

RECORDS in his office showed the car had been missing since Aug. 16. Sheriff Knight said the workers were arrested Sept. 24. and were en route to racial demonstrations in Crawfordville.

He said the car contained a bill of sale to a man he identified as Lester Hankinson, a SCOPE worker. SCOPE, headed by Mr. Williams, is an arm of SCLC.

He said Mr. Cave said that Hosea Williams had given him the keys to the car.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and the top administrator in his Southern Christian Leadership Conference Sunday answered published reports about a stolen car case involving SCLC aide Hosea Williams.

Dr. King said he has "the highest confidence and respect" for Williams, who he said had handled the purchasing of cars for use in voter registration drives.

"During the period following the Selma demonstrations leading up to the passage of the voting rights bill of 1965, SCLC purchased more than 50 new and used cars to provide transportation for voter registration drives across the South," he said.

GOT DOCUMENTS

"These cars were purchased from what we felt to be reputable new and used car salesmen and we received documents of title.

"When questions arose concerning the ownership of one of the cars, we cooperated with all proper authorities inquiring into the matter," Dr. King said.

The Rev. Andrew Young, executive director of SCLC and Dr. King's top administrator, called police action in the case "harassment" and said, "This is just another indication of the high price we pay for initiating social change."

STOPPED OFTEN

"It is ridiculous to imply that any member of SCLC's staff would be so stupid as to become involved knowingly in the purchase of stolen automobiles," he said.

"One of the things which constantly plagues us in the freedom movement is harassment by police officials in all our campaigns, whether they be direct action or voter registration. Our cars are stopped constantly and checked for every possible violation, so that we always have to be two hundred per cent right in order to get by.

HIGH FINES

"In our Birmingham registration drive, traffic fines often ran several hundred dollars a week. That was the price that they made us pay for registrating more than 36,000 voters," the Rev. Mr. Young said.

Published reports last week said that the Justice Department in Washington had taken control of a case involving at least one stolen car, to which Williams had the keys.

U.S. District Atty. Charles Goodson acknowledged that Washington officials had taken control of the case. Local FBI officials would not comment.

Delay in Allocation Of Literacy Funds Irks Rights Leader

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 31—James Farmer expressed Thursday "concern, some irritation and puzzlement" over the unexplained delay in the allocation of Federal antipoverty funds for a massive literacy program that he connot yet get off the ground.

"I'm chafing at the bit," said the former director of the Congress of Racial Equality, who quit that important civil rights post effective March 1 to head the private, non-profit and so-far penniless Center for Community Action Education.

The Negro leader had been promised $860,000 from the Office of Economic Opportunity at least three months ago, when his impending resignation from CORE became known. After this funding, his initial responsibility would be to raise at least $100,000 from private sources within six months to help run 18 pilot projects among the poor across the nation.

At a press conference following a speech here today, Mr. Farmer said that he had had "assurances" that the grant would be forthcoming "before Christmas, then the middle of February, then March 1. Now the date is quite uncertain."

Speaking slowly and with great care, he raised the question of "whether activists in the civil rights movement are, or are not, qualified recipients of Federal funds to conduct broader programs in the national interest."

Deacons for Defense Organize Armed Rights Unit in Chicago

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, April 5—The formation of a Chicago chapter of an armed racial equality group known as the Deacons for Defense and Justice was disclosed here today.

A Negro delegation from Bogalusa, La., headquarters of the organization and site of its birth during racial disturbances last year, outlined plans for its extension to Chicago and other places in the country at a news conference here.

The delegation came here to help form a branch of the vigilante group, to appeal for financial aid and to try to win the support of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Negro rights leader, who has indicated reluctance to work with the Deacons.

The conference was held at the Southside home of Laveron Cornelius, a leader of the Olive Branch Lodge of the Princee Hall Masons, who, with Ray McCoy, another lodge member, invited the Louisianans to Chicago.

Four men and two women from Bogalusa, representing the Deacons for Defense and the Bogalusa Voters League, of which the Deacons group is an affiliate, have been helping the two Negroes since last week to form a Deacons chapter here, it was said.

Charles Sims, president of the Bogalusa Deacons, stressed that the Deacon' guns would be used only in defense, but he did not discount the use of weapons "any place where there are black men and whites who want to give them equality."

"They [the whites] bring the fight to us. We don't take it to them," he said. "We guard white and black civil rights workers from white terrorists' bullets and churches from bombs."

Discussing plans for chapters in other cities, Mr. Sims said, "We will form them anywhere our help is needed." He said the Deacons did not have a chapter in New York City, but have the "friends of the Deacons" there and indicated that it might become a Deacons chapter.

PROGRESS BUOYS HOPES

Negroes Unshackling Fear of Whites

By JACK NELSON
Los Angeles Times News Service

Regardless of whether they live in Selma or Bogalusa or some other southern town with a civil rights movement, Negroes invariably sing one line of "we shall overcome" a little louder and with added fervor:

"We are not afraid . . ."

Sometimes it has been a little like whistling while walking through a cemetery at night. But one of the most significant results of the civil rights trouble in the South is that the Negro is conquering his fear of the white man and of the governmental institutions whites have controlled for so long.

In towns and counties where there have been movements, and especially where confrontations with white communities have resulted in forceful federal intervention, the abject fear that once inhibited many Negroes already has all but disappeared.

SO RAPIDLY are the emotions of the southern Negro changing, that some sociologists are worrying that in shedding his fears, he will find himself clothed in new frustrations. For the emboldened Negro's aspirations for a better life economically and socially are bound to outstrip what he could reasonably be expected to attain.

This is not to say that the Negro is free of fear. In some white supremacy strongholds there still is an abundance of fear—and good reason for it.

The Ku Klux Klan still is active in some places. The threat of economic reprisals still exists in many places. Whites still have almost absolute control over governmental institutions in most places.

Hosea Williams, one of Dr. Martin Luther King's aides, says that despite gains, fear remains the major problem in recruiting Negroes for the civil rights cause.

SOME NEGROES are so afraid, it's pitiful," he told a reporter. "A lot of them are shiftless and scared, just like the white man says, and they will be until they go through that confrontation with the white man.

"I don't know of any other way to get it out of 'em. You can't teach it out of 'em and you can't pray it out of 'em. The white folks are beginning to respect 'em in places where there have been demonstrations. In Selma the Negro used to be serning to make the courthouses part of their business.

IN ALBANY, GA., an old civil rights battleground, the Georgia Council on Human Relations recently met at the courthouse. Mayor James Davis welcomed the civil rights organization, and American Civil Liberties Union Attorney spoke, and the group, consisting mostly of Negroes, sang "'We Shall Overcome.

About this time a year ago Dr. King took his Negro voting rights campaign to the courthouse at Camden, the Wilcox County seat in Alabama's "black belt." Most Negroes hung back in small clusters around the courthouse square, fearful that whites might identify them with the civil rights movement.

Today they would pack the square to see Dr. King.

No Negroes in Wilcox were registered to vote before Dr. King's visit. Today they outnumber whites 3 to 2 on the registration list and four Wilcox County Negroes are among 60 Negroes running for local offices or legislative posts in Alabama's May 3 Democratic primary.

REGISTRATION of 400,000 Negroes in the five states principally affected by the 1965 voting rights act has had a tremendous impact in getting the Negro interested in making the courthouse his business.

The symbolic act of registering, of signing one's name (or even an "X" in the case of many illiterates) on an official document cannot be lightly dismissed. For most of these new voters never before have participated in the governing process.

The emerging Negro faces mixed blessings, of course. He may be politically free, but still economically and socially shackled.

On the one hand he opens new avenues of hope and opportunity. In recent months, for example, a number of towns and counties have hired Negro policemen and several counties have added Negroes to jury lists.

On the other hand, the average southern Negro, handicapped by inferior schools and still facing strong resistance to desegregation, increasingly will encounter the frustrations of economic and social deprivation that now plague black ghettos of the North.

DESPITE HIS PLIGHT, the southern Negro frequently has been buoyed by the progress he has made in the civil rights trouble. He can point to tangible results:

Enactment and enforcement of civil rights legislation; preparation of additional legislation to end Jim Crow justice; specific desegregation gains in towns and cities, and mass registration of voters and decline in racist politics.

There are places in the south —Atlanta, for example—where a northern brand of segregation already has taken hold.

One sociologist painted the South as going through the "easy part" of the inevitable changes in American race relations — the abolition of de jure, or legal, segregation. But the time is not far off when it will face the more complex problems of de facto segregation.

THOMAS F. PETTIGREW, associate professor of social psychology at Harvard University, believes by the 1970's there will be few distinctions between the northern and southern brands of segregation.

Dr. King says the Negro is little improved when he wins the right to sit at lunch counters with whites but cannot afford the price of a meal.

The dreams of freedom that Dr. King has expressed for oppressed Negroes in the South may turn into nightmares of frustrations unless bold steps are taken to pevent the spread of northern-type ghettos in Dixie.

and socially are bound to outstrip what he could reasonably be expected to attain.

This is not to say that the Negro is free of fear. In some white supremacy strongholds there still is an abundance of fear—and good reason for it.

The Ku Klux Klan still is active in some places. The threat of economic reprisals still exists in many places. Whites still have almost absolute control over governmental institutions in most places.

Hosea Williams, one of Dr. Martin Luther King's aides, says that despite gains, fear remains the major problem in recruiting Negroes for the civil rights cause.

SOME NEGROES are so afraid, it's pitiful," he told a reporter. "A lot of them are shiftless and scared, just like the white man says, and they will be until they go through that confrontation with the white man.

"I don't know of any other way to get it out of 'em. You can't teach it out of 'em and you can't pray it out of 'em. The white folks are beginning to respect 'em in places where there have been demonstrations. In Selma the Negro used to be considered lazy and shiftless with no guts. But not any more. People in Selma know the Negro is a man."

The combination of demonstrations, broad news coverage and action by the federal government has let Negroes master apprehensions that once shackled them to a segregation system and muzzled any voices of protest.

In the past year the same forces have been instrumental in drastically altering the police role in demonstrations from one of restraint to protection.

THE BEGINNING of the change followed the March 7, 1965, news coverage — especially by television — of demonstrators at Selma being beaten back by Sheriff Jim Clark's posse and Col. Al Lingo's state troopers.

The routing of Negroes with tear gas, clubs and whips brought angry cries for federal intervention.

In that incident and subsequent cases in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, federal court orders and FBI investigations of police brutality have brought noticeable changes in the conduct of police officers.

It is not uncommon now to find officers treating demonstrators courteously, sometimes even joking with them.

Beneath an old chinaberry tree in Greensville, Ala., not long ago a state police captain and the Rev. Andrew Young of Dr. King's staff stood facing each other. At a distance it looked like another civil rights confrontation.

BUT THE CAPTAIN couldn't have been more courteous. He was smiling. So was Mr. Young.

"Ya'll keep us mighty busy," the Captain joked, glancing past the young minister at a group preparing to march on the courthouse. "When you gonna give us a break?"

"We gotta march 'til we got our freedom," replied Mr. Young, and they both laughed.

Courthouses, the centers of political power in rural and small town areas where segregation is most deeply rooted, long have been objects of special dread for Negroes who might have ideas contrary to the "Southern way of life. They have been places where the white man carried on the business of governnment and where Negroes visited only to pay taxes or see segregated justice dispensed.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13,

Sammy Davis Jr. Appointed to N.A.A.C.P. Post

Entertainer Named to Head Life-Membership Drive

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

A year ago Sammy Davis Jr. scraped stubborn, Alabama red clay from his expensive cowboy boots. It was a memento of his trip to entertain the Selma - to - Montgomery civil righs marchers.

Today he keeps the mud in a jar in a place of honor in his living room. He says he will keep it for the rest of his life.

This is the serious side of the entertainer, a man whose public image is that of a perpetual-motion, rapid-fire show-business factotum.

Yesterday the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People laid claim to both sides of Mr. Davis, when its board of directors named him chairman of its vitally important Life Membership Committee.

Mr. Davis's serious side will direct the committee's five-member full-time staff and 35 prominent volunteer committee members in a series of recruiting efforts to add more names to the growing list of 18,500 N.A.C.P. life members.

His better-known side will promote the sale of the life memberships, which cost $500. Mr. Davis will offer the memberships which accounted for one-third of the N.A.A.C.P.'s $1,319,900 income last year, to friends in the limelight as well as to fans on the darkened side of the footlights.

Mr. Davis, who performs in about 100 shows yearly without charge for civil rights groups, civic and philanthropic causes, sees some of these organizations as potential "lifers."

Benefits to Help New Job

"From now on," he said, "instead of refusing an honorarium I'll have it used as payment, or partial payment for the group's N.A.A.C.P. life membership." He explained that the total fee can be paid on a time payment basis.

N.A.A.C.P. officials have admitted that the organization is in a serious financial state, because of a loss last year of about 20,000 members, higher operating costs and about $265,000 tied up in bail bonds in Mississippi resulting from civil-rights demonstrations years ago.

The busy actor-singer-dancer-mimic said that the unsalaried position with the nation's largest civil rights group would keep him even busier but that he "could not be prouder" in accepting the committee chairmanship.

"It's a matter of standing up and being counted," he said. "When my kids ask me 20 years from now what did I do in the civil-rights movement, I want to tell them — did my very best—if I didn't now, I wouldn't be able to look them in the face."

The entertainer's wife, May Britt an actress, and their three members. His entertainment children are N. A. A. C. P., life staff gathered recently in Mr. Davis' dressing room in a Brooklyn television studio, expecting to work out some problems remaining in an upcoming television show.

"Now dig this," he greeted them, holding life-membership brochures, "I want everybody to have one of these—now don't worry about the cost, you don't have to pay it all at once.

Ex-Chairman Promoted

The 39-year-old Mr. Davis replaces Kivie Kaplan, a retired leather-goods manufacturer from Boston, who served as chairman of the Life Membership Committee from 1954 through 1965. The organization had only 221 life members at the time Mr. Kaplan took over the committee.

Mr. Kaplan, 61, who has been active with the N.A.A.C.P. for 33 years in a variety of volunteer roles, was elected president of the 450,000-member organization last January.

In announcing the appointment of Mr. Davis, Mr. Kaplan said yesterday that he had "every confidence that Sammy will give dynamic and productive leadership to the continuing drive to enroll 100,000 N.A.A.C.P. life members."

During his tenure as life membership chairman, Mr. Kaplan sold life memberships to persons in all walks of life and in all places to which he traveled.

With other white and Negro N.A.A.C.P. board members, he toured and tested the integration of public accommodations in Mississippi just days after the civil-rights bill was signed in 1964.

During the tour he approached a man he described as "looking like a prosperous little Jewish businessman" and began a discussion of he need to support the N.A.A.C.P. The man turned out to be a local sheriff who expressed a series of rather profane reasons for not supporting the civil-rights group.

Reminded recently of his predecessor's most famous failure, Mr. Davis said his duties as chairman would probably not extend to recruiting among Misissippi sheriffs.

DR. KING'S GROUP SCORES KY JUNTA

MOVEMENT

Calls on Johnson to Weigh a Vietnam Withdrawal

NYT 4/14/66

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, April 13 — The Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., called on the Johnson Administration today to abandon the ruling military junta of South Vietnam and consider withdrawing from the country altogether.

The executive board of the civil rights organization, which is based here, adopted the resolution at a meeting in Miami. Dr. King announced it at a news conference there.

Although Dr. King has spoken against American involvement in the war before, this was the first time that his organization has taken a formal stand on it. Always before, he had carefully emphasized that his views were personal and did not represent the organization.

Civil rights leaders have debated for months the wisdom of civil rights activists' participating in the peace movement.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has suffered financially since taking a militant stand against United States involvement in Vietnam.

The Rev. Andrew Young, executive director of the leadership conference, said the organization had lost a few contributions because of Dr. King's previous utterances against the war.

The resolution adopted in Miami said, "We call on our Government to desist from aiding the military junta against the Buddhists, Catholics and students of Vietnam, whose efforts to democratize their Government are more in consonance with our traditions than the policy of the military oligarchy."

"If we are true to our own ideals we have no choice but to abandon the military junta under such manifestly vigorous popular opposition," it said.

"We believe the moment is now opportune and the need urgent to reassess our position and seriously examine the wisdom of prompt withdrawal."

Free Elections Sought

The resolution urged the Administration to seek free elections in Vietnam and to abide by the results. It was timed to support the demonstrations of various dissident elements threatening the Government of Premier Nguyen Cao Ky in Saigon.

Mr. Young said the board believed that the time was ripe for it to speak on Vietnam policy because the anti-Ky demonstrators had shown that nonviolent protest could be effective, even in the midst of war.

Dr. King, a Nobel Peace Prize winner, is committed to nonviolence as a solution to international problems as well as to American civil rights disputes.

Mr. Young said the resolution did not mean that the leadership conference would participate in peace demonstrations or support them financially.

The Georgia House of Representatives voted earlier this year not to seat Julian Bond, public relations director of the student committee, after he endorsed an antiwar statement that was much more militant than the one adopted by the leadership conference today.

The leadership conference resolution was criticized by Paul Anthony, director of the Southern Regional Council at Atlanta.

"Everyone is seriously concerned about our foreign policy and it leads to honest differences of opinion," Mr. Anthony said, "but it is the greatest of mistakes to mix domestic civil rights and foreign policy."

On the other hand, he said, adoption of the resolution indicates "the growing boldness of those who are dissatisfied with the Vietnam policy."

Concern on Congress

Some civil rights leaders have worried over the possibility that antiwar statements by civil rights groups might alienate Congressmen and members of the Johnson Administration and damage the chances of passing further civil rights legislation.

Illustrating the intricacy of political relationships in the civil rights movement, Walter Fauntroy, Dr. King's chief representative in Washington, is vice chairman of the White House Conference on Civil Rights, to be held June 1 and 2.

A recent poll by Louis Harris showed that 4 out of 10 Americans were unfavorably disposed toward civil rights groups opposing the Vietnam war. Forty-one per cent of those polled said that when a civil rights group came out against the war, it made them less in favor of civil rights for Negroes.

Dr. King announced Aug. 12, 1965 at Birmingham that he would ask the leaders of the United States, Communist China, the Soviet Union, North Vietnam and South Vietnam to halt the war.

The next day, 400 delegates to the annual meeting of the leadership conference approved a resolution authorizing Dr. King to "throw the resources" of the organization behind the effort to end the war.

Dr. King apparently dropped his plan to approach the heads of state when it was pointed out that the Logan Act prohibits a private citizen from dealing with a foreign government.

Some civil rights leaders have opposed involving civil rights organizations in the peace movement. Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said in January that he could not go along with the student committee's strong statement against the war. The statement called the United States participation in the Vietnam conflict murderous aggression.

The resolution said in part:

"What has aptly been called 'the gangrene of Vietnam' has in recent weeks made a conflict of confused direction a tragic spectacle. American policy has become imprisoned in the destiny of the military oligarchy.

'Despised by People'

"Our men and equipment are revealed to be serving a regime so despised by its own people that, in the midst of conflict, they are seeking its overthrow. Not only the Vietcong but basic institutions of the South Vietnam society, Buddhists, Catholics and students, are expressing contempt for the bankrupt government we have blindly supported and even exalted.

"The immorality and tragic absurdity of our position is revealed by the necessity to protect our nationals from the population and army we were told were our cherished allies and toward whom we were benefactors.

"Beyond this, the confused war has played havoc with our domestic destinies. Despite feeble protestation to the contrary, the promises of the Great Society top the casualty list of the conflict. The pursuit of widened war has narrowed domestic welfare programs, making the poor, white and Negro, bear the heaviest burdens, both at the front and at home.

"Another casualty in this war is the principle of dissent. We deplore efforts to characterize opposition to the war as disloyal or traitorous, because such attacks on dissent are themselves destructive of our most fundamental democratic traditions.

"More important, S.C.L.C., as an organization committed to nonviolence, must condemn this war on the grounds that war is not the way to solve social problems. Mass murder can never lead to constructive and creative government or to the creation of a democratic society in Vietnam."

Sordid Adventure Seen

MIAMI, April 13 (AP)—Dr. King said today the United States war effort was "rapidly degenerating into a sordid military adventure."

"It is imperative to end a war that has played havoc with our domestic destinies," Dr. King said.

Referring to the Buddhists, Catholics and students of Vietnam, Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference said in a resolution adopted aoday:

"They are perhaps the first people in history to attempt to secure representative government in the midst of war by peaceful means. If we are true to our own ideals we have no choice but to abandon the military junta."

The resolution said further "the intense expetcation and hope of the neglected poor in the United States must be regarded as a priority more urgent than pursuit of a conflict so rapidly degenerating into a sordid military adventure."

Dr. King said his organization planned no immediate demonstration for Vietnam peace.

"Our first consideration is still civil rights," he said.

Dr. King added "if the war continues and nothing is done to de-escalate it, some elements of our civil rights movement may have to demonstrate to preserve our program of domestic progress."

He said his Southern Christian Leadership Conference has passed a resolution saying the Buddsts and students of South Vietnam are more in tune with the American tradition than the "military oligarchy" this countrty is supporting.

"It is imperative to end a war that has played havoc with our domestic destinies," Dr. King added.

He said the civil rights group took this position at its annual board meeting here.

SCLC Says Car Theft Talk Aims to Block Voter Drive

AC 4/15/66

By BILL SHIPP

Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference charged Friday that "Georgia political powers" are trying to link SCLC staffer Hosea Williams to a stolen car case to prevent him from carrying out a Negro voter registration campaign.

The SCLC statement was issued after The Atlanta Journal reported it had obtained an affidavit from Harold Belton Andrews in which Andrews swore that Williams was involved in the theft of cars.

Morris Finley, a contract printer for SCLC, and Andrews have been indicted in connection with the transportation of a stolen car and with receiving, concealing and selling a car which was ultimately traced to SCLC.

Justice department attorneys from Washington have taken over the case from local federal officials.

Finley's attorney, Joe Salem, Friday released an affidavit from Finley in which Finley charged Andrews with lying and said he would take an FBI lie detector test if Andrews would.

Attorney Salem said he was releasing Finley's version of the stolen car transaction because Andrews' version had been published and "I felt the time had come to tell the truth."

"I tried not to talk to reporters relative to this case," he said. "I felt until now that this was a matter for the courts and not a matter that should be aired out in the news media."

Meanwhile, The Atlanta Constitution asked the Justice department why Andrews, a man who has a long criminal record, suddenly decided to tell about stealing cars when he stands a good chance of going to prison. Justice department officials refused to answer. Salem released the text of a recorded conversation in which Finley claimed that he and another Negro man had had sexual relations with a white woman with whom Andrews was acquainted.

Andrews could not be reached for comment Friday. Neither could Williams, who was reported by SCLC to be "out of town." An SCLC spokesman said he did not know where Williams was.

Finley said he was present when Williams confronted Andrews after officers discovered illegal registration on one of the cars that Andrews had provided SCLC. He said Williams cursed Andrews for putting "them hot cars on us."

Finley told of making arrangements through a third party to purchase cars for SCLC from Andrews. Finley said he made this arrangement last summer, and was paid a commission by SCLC.

Finley said checks for the cars were made payable to him by SCLC and he cashed them, took out his commission, and gave the rest to a third party who, in turn, paid Andrews.

Finley was first connected with the case officially when federal agents searched his print shop on the basis of an affidavit given by Andrews in which Andrews accused Finley of printing fraudulent payroll checks on an electrical concern in Nebraska.

Federal agents apparently found no evidence of printing fraudulent checks. Charges have not been pressed against Finley.

Finley has no previous arrest record. Andrews has a lengthy criminal record. Much of his past record involves stolen cars.

Finley and Andrews were indicted jointly in the car theft case. Salem has filed a motion for severance and has accused the Justice department, in his brief, of suppressing evidence.

CORE PLAN UPSETS BALTIMORE MAYOR

'Why Us?' McKeldin Asks of Selection as Target City

NYT 4/17/66

Special to The New York Times

BALTIMORE, April 16 — Mayor Theodore R. McKeldin registered surprise this week at the Congress of Racial Equality's plans to concentrate its resources on fighting what it contends are bigotry and discrimination in the city.

"Why us?" asked Mr. McKeldin, a Republican who has always been a favorite with Negro voters. They helped elect him Governor of Maryland for two terms.

"Baltimore was chosen simply because it is segregated in all areas," said Sampson Green, co-chairman of the local CORE chapter's housing committee.

"There are no particular signs that, unless someone does something positively, it [segregation] is ever going to be changed," said Mr. Green.

CORE officials here convinced Floyd B. McKissick, the national director, and other national officers in New York City that this schizophrenic city with both a Northern and Southern heritage should be singled out for one big push. Mr. McKissick, announced on Thursday that Baltimore had been selected as CORE's "target city."

Housing Tops List

James M. Griffin, chairman of Baltimore's CORE, promised an all-out attack against what he considers the No. 1 problem: housing.

The Negro people, he complained, "have been slapped in the face" by a City Council that has refused to pass a fair housing bill on three occasions.

Mr. Griffin and other civil rights leaders were equally disturbed when recently the State Legislature rejected a bill that would have permitted apartment tenants to withhold rents from slum landlords who refused to repair their properties.

Nearly 40 per cent of Baltimore's approximately 965,000 residents are Negro, and their numbers are growing at a faster rate than the whites.

Hundreds of new Negroes arrive every week, mostly from the poverty-striken Appalachian states nearby, to settle in crowded old red-brick row houses in east, west and central Baltimore.

Poor and uneducated, many quickly join the 14,573 Baltimore families now receiving welfare aid for families with dependent children.

Rats and Landlords Feared

Their enemies, says CORE, are the rats that share their skimpy rooms and the landlords who come each week for the rent and turn the tenants out if the payments are not met.

CORE officials also resent the city's urban renewal officials, who they say have uprooted 1,800 Negroes for six new projects but have returned only one to live in his old neighborhood.

On top of the problems of slums and what CORE considers a bureaucratic shifting of tenants, is another difficulty faced by the city's growing Negro middle class: There is no place for them in segregated suburban neighborhoods just outside the city and most new high-rise apartments downtown are successfully keeping them out.

Mr. Griffin and most other civil rights leaders are convinced that segregated housing is the root of all the other city's racial problems — segregated schools, recreation provisions, and, in some cases employment.

"The situation's bad all over the country," said Mayor McKeldin, "We've done everything possible." He said no one had fought harder for the interests of the Negro than he and, "I've been vilified because of my interest in them."

Thomas J. D'Alesandro 3d, the president of the City Council, said he was not disturbed "that Baltimore was pinpointed. It's a challenge that will call for a facing up to the problem by government, the power structure and the citizens."

Mr. D'Alesandro was the unsuccessful guide of fair housing legislation in the City Council.

Mr. Griffin refused to say what tactics CORE would employ in its Baltimore drive. But other Negro leaders said that workers from the national office had been in Baltimore for some time laying the groundwork for the summer when the schools let out.

State Regional Aide Named

ALBANY, April 16 (UPI) — Governor Rockefeller appointed a new director of the Office of Regional Development today and gave the present director, Harold A. Jerry Jr., a new job. The Governor named First Deputy of Commerce Commissioner Ronald B. Peterson to head the regional development office. Mr. Jerry will be the new director of special planning and recreation projects in the Conservation Department.

Civil Rights: A Cautious Lull in City MOVEMENT

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

They chanted "Freedom Now!" until they were hoarse and they trudged for miles in tight, police-bordered circles, until their feet were sore. Some of their picket signs were cleverly worded and others were droll.

They were the thousands of white and Negro civil rights demonstrators calling for an end to racial discrimination. But they are seldom seen these days on the streets of New York.

Although the stated goals of the volunteer activists—equal job opportunities, school-integration and housing without discrimination—have not been fully attained, the demonstrations have been greatly curtailed.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has announced plans for the resumption of big demonstrations if there is no major achievement soon in the employment of Negroes in the building trades. A one-day N.A.A.C.P. picket line marched at a West Side building site here two weeks ago.

Generally, however, there has been a lull for months in civil rights protests in the city. This is attributed primarily to the concentration on the campaign against poverty, and to appointments and other acts by Mayor Lindsay's administration.

Sit-ins, eat-ins, sleep-ins and a host of other activities designed to dramatize the fight against discriminatory practices took place almost daily here two and three years ago. Builders were forced to stop work at some construction sites because demonstrators lay in the path of trucks or were chained to cranes.

Traffic on the Triborough Bridge was once held up by a group from the Congress of Racial Equality, and a proposed "stall-in" kept discouraged traffic from the vicinity of the World's Fair when it opened in the spring of 1964.

But these measures are not in evidence these days.

The idea that the demonstration is only one of the tools available to activists and that it is not meant to solve, or is capable of solving, all problems, was stressed by many civil rights spokesmen.

Jeff Greenup, chairman of the New York branch of the N.A.A.C.P., says: "We don't demonstrate just for the purpose of demonstrating; as long as we can make progress in other ways we much prefer it that way."

The chairman of the New York chapter of the Congress of Racial Equality, Roy Ennis, whose group was active recently in picketing a Harlem police station, sees the situation differently. Mr. Ennis said the lull in demonstrations began during the summer of 1964.

"President Johnson asked us to lay down our arms temporarily during his campaign against Barry Goldwater," he said, "and many groups simply never picked up their arms again."

The consensus among civil rights spokesmen is that the social legislation passed in the last few years, including antipoverty, voting, civil rights and education measures, has led many activists to feel that direct action in the civil rights movement is no longer necessary.

This, the spokesmen say, has resulted in a loss of membership of N.A.A.C.P. and CORE groups locally and across the country. Many rights advocates say they have been encouraged by the activists of the Lindsay administration. These, they say, appear to be highly effective in fighting racial discrimination.

"A civil rights group is a group organized to put itself out of business," was the way a prominent activist put it. "You will naturally see a falling off of activity and of members as government takes over more and more of what was traditionally thought to be civil rights activities," he said.

These, as he saw it, include voter registration, fair employment practices, aid to education and community organization through antipoverty programs.

The activist added, however: "The racial discrimination has not ended, and the rights groups are going to catch the devil trying to maintain the enthusiasm and drive to keep up their memberships, because of the government assistance."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, largest of the civil rights groups, lost about 20,000 of its 465,000 members throughout the country last year. Local chapters counted their own losses by the hundreds, and in some cases by the thousands.

The chapters are currently engaged in recruiting drives to bring civil rights "dropouts" back into the fold. Sources close to the predominantly Negro mass membership organization said the decline had seriously disrupted the group's efforts to exert more influence among the grassroots Negro communities.

Directed to Middle Class

"We're now basically middle-class oriented," said one official, "and while we were trying to figure out ways to organize the poorer Negroes, we lost a good number of our regular members."

The president of the New York State Chapter of the N. A. A. C. P., Dr. Eugene T. Reed, said the key to its current program was "getting to and helping the Negro on the bottom rung of the ladder."

The poor, Dr. Reed said, are doubly disadvantaged because they are not only without money but also without knowledge of new programs that might help lift them out of their poverty.

Dr. Reed announced recently that his organization would resume big-scale demonstrations at building sites if the unions did not halt what he called their discriminatory apprenticeship and membership policies.

The N. A. A. C. P. took part three years ago in demonstrations that hindered construction of an annex of the Harlem Hospital, the Downstate Medical Center in Brooklyn and Rochdale Village, a housing project in Queens.

The Reed announcement followed a statement by the former N. A. A. C. P. state president, William H. Booth, who now heads the city's Commission on Human Rights, that the commission would hold public hearings on discrimination in the building trades.

Yesterday, Chairman Booth released a telegram in which he warned Peter J. Brennan, president of the New York Building Trades Council, that he would start court action for failing to supply requested information on progress toward integration in the industry unless the data were received "forthwith."

'Reasonable Time' Offered

Dr. Reed maintained that his organization would work independently of the commission and "would allow a reasonable amount of time" for that agency to conduct the hearings and for the city to act.

The national labor secretary of the organization, Herbert Hill, commenting on the possible new demonstrations, said: "To the degree that laws are not enforced, to that degree civil rights advocates will have to take to the streets."

Members of CORE had been in the forefront of the multitude of direct-action projects in the city in recent years. They were often termed the "shock troops" of the civil rights movement.

Their activity and their offices are in the poorer parts of the Negro ghettos and new antipoverty programs in these areas have in many cases hired the local leadership that CORE groups helped to develop, as well as CORE workers themseves.

In addition, "poverty programs palliated the efforts of rights groups and lessened the need, in many cases, for strong civil rights actions," said Donald Smith, public relations director for the national CORE office.

Mr. Smith said the group's emphasis has been shifted to job development and the assisting of community groups to take more active part in political and governmental programs. Its branches have also suffered losses in membership, and some chapters, including the highly vocal East River (River Rats) branch, have been disbanded.

Many Quit for Peace Work

Reliable sources say that many of the young white volunteers who had been active in the organization have shifted to peace organizations.

Mr. Innis, the leader of the New York chapter, believes that the antipoverty program has succeeded in "tranquilizing" the civil rights movement throughout the country. "It promises a lot and robs the movement of some of its best talent, and while it does not solve the problems it maintains the image of a problem-solver."

Several spokesmen for the Atlanta-based Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee have expressed similar thoughts.

This group's field staff of 200 has been reduced by more than 50 because field workers have taken jobs with the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Federal antipoverty agency.

The personnel situation is so serious for the organization that its chairman, John Lewis, said recently he would spend the rest of the year recruiting college students for work among rural Negroes in the South.

S. N. C. C. workers usually receive a subsistence allowance as field workers. Spokesmen for the Office of Economic Opportunity have said civil rights workers fit easily into antipoverty programs because of their interests and skills in community organization.

Public's Aid Declines

Athough the New York office of S. N. C. C. operates principally as an administrative and fund-raising arm, its workers have often joined or led local demonstrations to protest discrimination in the South.

Both the student organization and the Congress of Racial Equality are currently operating at deficits because of the lack of contributions from the general public. Surveys have shown that direct-action rights groups can expect to receive funds, primarily from white liberals, when they are involved in highly publicized and Southern-based fights against discrimination.

Civil rights workers say contributions often drop off if the activities are unpopular — for example, the proposed World's Fair stall-in. Said one CORE worker: "You can't mount a controversial demonstration in the North and expect to pay the rent on your office."

Spokesmen for the N. A. A. C. P. say their organization is supported primarily by its $2 individual membership fees.

One civil rights group that is prospering currently, however, is the Urban League. Staffed principally by trained social and community workers, the league, its spokesmen say, has received numerous offers from government and industry to carry out research and pilot projects aimed at improving conditions in Negro areas.

League's 1963 Plan Cited

League officials say the war on poverty follows closely the organization's 1963 proposal for a "domestic Marshall Plan."

That proposal took its name from the $17-billion United States program that aided in the rehabilitation of postwar Europe, and it proposed similar efforts on behalf of Negroes in education, employment, housing and health and welfare.

The Urban League has always been oriented toward social work, education, and job opportunities, and its Greater New York branches supported school boycotts and construction-site demonstrations during recent years.

Some rights workers said there were fewer picket lines now in New York because many Negroes were "greatly encouraged" by appointments by Mayor Lindsay and his support of a civilian police review board.

Mr. Greenup, the N. A. A. C. P. leader, said the Negro community was pleased with the appointment of Howard R. Leary as Police Commissioner and the upgrading of Sanford D. Garelik to Chief Inspector and Lloyd Sealy to Deputy Chief Inspector.

Activists called both Commissioner Leary and Chief Inspector Garelik "fair-minded." Deputy Chief Inspector Sealy, the highest ranking Negro on the police force, had been the first of his race to command a Harlem police precinct, following the Harlem riots in 1964. He was hailed by the Negro community at that time and has continued to have their support.

The new Buildings Commissioner, Charles G. Moerdler, in his highly publicized jousts with the city's slumlords, has also won praise from the Negro community. Also praised was the appointment of Robert O. Lowery, a Negro, on the commission.

The Booth Appointment

But by far the most significant administration move, to the civil rights activists, was the appointment of one of their own number to head the city's Commission on Human Rights.

Mr. Booth, often called "Wild Bill Booth" because of his strong civil rights stands in the past, had been a long-time community leader in Jamaica, Queens, where he led the months-long demonstrations at Rochdale Village.

One of his first acts as a city official, Mr. Booth said, would be to remake the image of the commission in the minds of the Negro and Puerto Rican communities. Activists from both communities have long complained that the commission served only to placate Negroes and Puerto Ricans. It had deceived minority groups into thinking the agency would help fight discriminatory practices when in fact, it did not, he asserted.

Mr. Booth had been one of the most vocal critics of the commission. It was "used as a shield for the administration and a passive research organization," Mr. Booth said recently, and promised that it would not be that under his leadership.

In office since February, Commissioner Booth has served notice that he will use the powers of City Hall to break down any discrimination that might be found in the hiring practices of business, labor and city agencies. Mayor Linday said recently that he supported these efforts.

In its quarterly report to the Mayor, the commission reported yesterday that the number of discrimination complaints it had received had quadrupled since Feb. 1, but a commission spokesman declined to reveal the precise number of complaints.

Meetings With Minorities

Mr. Booth has set up monthly meetings between the Police Commissioner and community leaders, a concession long urged by Negro and Puerto Rican spokesmen. In addition, the commission's semi-monthly meetings are now held in the various ghetto areas.

Some authorities on mass psychology have said that demonstrations of the type that rocked New York City a few years ago were in effect some of the best activities to prevent riots in depressed areas.

Arthur I. Waskow, author of a recently published book, "From Race Riot to Sit-in," said: "In the absence of creative disorders [meaning organized demonstrations] there might well be riots in the ghettos."

Mr. Waskow, a research fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies, said sizable groups of unemployed youths had natural tendencies towards "heroisms and physical activities" that had to find expression, either through demonstrations or violence.

Mr. Waskow said that "creative disorders" were still common in the South and that the Watts section of Los Angeles, where two riots occurred within eight months, "has had the least amount of creative disorders."

Tomorrow: Negroes have hopeful despite problems of the ghettoes.

Sabotage in Alabama

Extremist elements in Alabama's civil rights movement have adopted a rule-or-ruin attitude toward the forthcoming Democratic primary there that can only produce frustration and defeat for the state's Negroes.

The current political campaign in Alabama is an exciting, precedent-breaking event. On May 3 the Democratic voters will choose a candidate for Governor from among eleven candidates. The old-line segregationists are backing Mrs. George C. Wallace, a stand-in candidate for her husband, the demagogic incumbent. Her principal opponents are two liberals, Attorney General Richmond M. Flowers and former Representative Carl Elliott. Many local officials are also being chosen.

Negro voters are in a position for the first time to play an important and perhaps decisive role in the primary. Since the enactment of the Voting Rights Act less than nine months ago, the number of Negro voters in the state has more than doubled. They now account for about one-quarter of the total registration.

If they fuse their strength with liberal white voters they can achieve tangible gains in fairer administration of justice and better treatment from state and local government. Already their presence on the voting rolls has done away with race-baiting and raised the level of the campaign.

Under these circumstances, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee's call for Negro voters to boycott the primary is destructive mischief-making. It derives from the same attitude of extremism for the sake of extremism that prevailed in the senseless demonstration against Sargent Shriver in last week's antipoverty conference in Washington and in the refusal of the Mississippi Freedom Democrats to accept a generous compromise worked out in their behalf at the 1964 Democratic National Convention.

The SNCC officials insist they would prefer segregationist officials because their presence would keep Negroes aroused and militant. In other words, they reject reforms and improvements that could be achieved politically in favor of a revolutionary posture toward all of society and Government.

The end result of the disruptive doctrine they espouse could well be the one of which the Rev. Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, secretary-elect of the World Council of Churches, warned the rebels who broke up the meeting of the Citizens Crusade Against Poverty: "There won't be anything to take over after you've taken over."

NEGRO TRAINING BEGINS 2D PHASE

Urban League Program Will Stress Political Role

By M. S. HANDLER

The National Urban League announced yesterday that its program to discover, identify and train a self-conscious political Negro community leadership in the United States was about to enter its second phase.

In its first year—1965—the program concentrated on establishing contact with groups and interesting people in neighborhoods to develop leadership skills.

This year, community action assemblies will be convened in 10 cities to deal with political education of potential community leaders and the role of citizens in public education.

The Urban League program, financed with a $475,000 Rockefeller Foundation grant, is aimed at filling the void of Negro leadership in communities throughout the country. The void was uncovered when scores of Federal, state, and local antipoverty programs got under way several years ago.

Assisting Government

The Urban League, a service organization in the field of civil rights, is engaged today in educational, welfare, health and job-training programs. It has become one of the most favored vehicles of United States Government departments, big industry and business and private foundations in efforts to bring Negroes into the mainstream of American life.

Under the second phase of the leadership program the 10 community assemblies will consider the following four questions in the field of political education:

¶What are the major problems in our town that should be considered by the political leadership?

¶How do we involve citizens in affecting change through the political process?

¶How can organizations such as churches and neighborhood groups use their influence for change?

¶How can we organize the community for political goals, including voter registration?

The basic goal on the issue of public education will be to define the role of citizens in participation in education.

April and May Assemblies

Nine assemblies will take place this month and in May, and a 10th will be in New Orleans in September. The April-May assemblies aill be held in Chicago, Los Angeles, St. Louis, Springfield, Ohio; Baltimore, Cleveland, Miami, Wichita, Kan., and Washington, D.C.

The assemblies are counted on to turn up at least 1,000 potential Negro leaders to be trained to form the core of neighborhood self-help projects and for membership on the boards of community organizations.

The third and final phase of the project will be to place these people on the boards and set in motion processes by which they will be able to involve the rest of the community.

According to the Urban League, last year's fruits of the first phase of the program were encouraging. One man who participated in an early leadership seminar has been elected mayor of a small town near Cleveland. Mayors in Miami and Los Angeles have requested resumes of persons who could become involved in local governmental activities.

Chemical Exports Rising

Shipments by American chemical manufacturers have risen more than 6 per cent annually since 1958, the Commerce Department says. Factory sales of power, distribution and specialty transformers may total $780-million this year, the department estimates. This would be a 6 per cent gain over 1965.

NAACP Is Ruled Liable for Damage

By REMER TYSON

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Supreme Court dismissed Wednesday an appeal to exempt the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People from responsibility in an $85,793 damage award to a Savannah, Ga., food market owner.

The ruling split the court, 5 to 4.

A dissenting opinion by Justice William O. Douglas argued the evidence was insufficient to make the national civil rights organization responsible for the event that took place at the Tropical Market in Savannah after May 30, 1962.

Pickets organized by the Savannah NAACP branch marched at the open air market in a predominantly Negro neighborhood after Robert Lee Bolton, a 14-year-old Negro boy, charged that Halred Overstreet, owner of the market, beat him. The boy was employed by Overstreet, who denied beating Bolton and said he fired him for stealing food.

Violence erupted during the picketing and Overstreet charged that his business was damaged by the demonstrations.

The market owner filed a damage suit against W. W. Law, president of the Savannah NAACP branch and head of the Georgia NAACP branch; the Rev. F. P. Jordan, first vice president of the Savannah NAACP; the Georgia NAACP, and the NAACP of New York.

A Chatham County Superior Court jury returned a judgment of $35,793 compensatory damages and $50,000 special damages against the defendant.

The Georgia Supreme Court eliminated the state NAACP as a defendant and affirmed the judgment against the others.

The U.S. Supreme Court agreed in December to hear arguments on one of four questions contained in an appeal.

The question was whether the NAACP of New York was deprived of due process of law by being held liable in damages for acts performed without the national organization's knowledge and by persons beyound its control.

Rights Leader Williams Released After Traffic Charges in Chatham

MOVEMENT

RC 4/27/66

SAVANNAH, Ga. (UPI)—Civil rights leader Hosea Williams has been released from the Chatham county jail on orders of County Commissioner Charles F. Wood.

Williams was freed Monday night when Wood, chairman of the county police committee, called county police headquarters and told a desk sergeant to release the Negro leader pending a hearing in police court.

Williams was jailed earlier in the night on charges of speeding, reckless driving and "tail-gating," or following too closely.

A second county commissioner, John Rousakis, was present at the Chatham County jail when Williams was released. Rousakis asked Williams if had been treated roughly and the Negro replied, "No." But he added that the charges of reckless driving and "tail-gaiting" are "brutalities in themselves."

Williams said he refused to post bond because "I didn't commit no crime."

However, he admitted to Rousakis that he had been speeding, stating that "If the speed limit there was 40, then I certainly was doing 50."

But he added "How was I reckless driving?"

County police officer J. J. Davin said Williams, one of Rev. Martin Luther King's chief lieutenants, left a car rental parking lot at the Savannah Municipal airport late Monday at a high rate of speed and made a sharp turn in "a reckless manner."

Davin said Willliams passed several cars and increased his speed to 60 miles an hour in a 40-mile-an-hour zone and kept moving across the center line trying to pass other vehicles.

The police officer said he stopped Williams and ordered him to follow the police car to the downtown police headquarters. He said Williams started speeding again and also "tail-gated" the police car. Davin said he then told Williams that he was committing a state offense and that the Negro leader replied: "Don't read the law to me, boy. If you don't like the way I drive the car, drive it yourself."

Williams came to Savannah from Atlanta to officiate in a local beauty pageant to elect a "Miss Tan."

Williams is a former resident of Savannah and was a leader in civil rights demonstrations in Savannah two years ago.

N.A.A.C.P. APPEAL REFUSED BY COURT

High Tribunal Lets $85,739 Picketing Judgment Stand

By FRED P. GRAHAM

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Without explnation, the Supreme Court let stand today an $85,739 judgment against the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People arising out of the picketing of a Savannah, Ga., store.

The action drew a vigorous dissent from four Justices, who said it opened the way for "crushing verdicts that may stifle organized dissent."

Writing for the dissenters, Justice William O. Douglas charged that the majority of five, without giving reasons, had raised "a threat to political association." Joining him in the dissent were Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices William J. Brennan Jr. and Abe Fortas.

The Court's ruling was announced in the following unsigned nine-word decision that had the effect of rejecting the N.A.A.C.P.'s appeal:

"The writ of certiorari is dismissed as improvidently granted."

This wss an unusual procedure for the court, which usuall feels compelled to decide a case on its merits if four Justices vote to grant a petition for a writ of certiorari (review).

Unusual Reversal

Although Justice Douglas did not discuss this point in his dissent, apparently review was granted upon the votes of the four dissenters, and then after the parties briefed the case and argued it on March 29, the five other Justices outvoted then and ruled that the appeal should never have been accepted.

The Justices in the majority were Hugo L. Black, Tom C. Clark, John M. Harlan, Potter Stewart and Byron R. White.

As a result of the decision, Haldred Overstreet, a white grocer, may collect the damages from the national N.A.A.C.P. organization, its Savannah branch or two branch officers.

The dispute arose in 1962 over charges that Mr. Overstreet had beaten a 14-year-old Negro boy in his store. After Mr. Overstreet denied the charges, the boy's mother persuaded the Savannah N.A.A.C.P. branch to organize a boycott of the store.

The picketing that continued for the next three weeks involved intimidation of potential customers, blocking of sidewalks and scattered incidents of violence.

Unaware of Boycott

There was no evidence that members of the local N.A.A.C.P. group were personally responsible for the misconduct, and the national group did not know about the boycott until it was served with a court order to end it.

Mr. Overstreet contended that the defendants had conspired to damage his business, and the jury awarded him $50,000 in punitive damages and $35,793 in compensatory damages. Only the national group appealed the decision.

In his dissent, Justice Douglas contended that the national group could not have been liable for the damage under the law of agency, because there was no proof that it had any control over the persons who did the acts, nor any knowledge of the boycott.

He said the Judge's instructions to the jury had not made this clear, and indeed made it appear that the "affiliate" branch chapter was tantamount to an "agent."

Justice Douglas concluded that, although the agency question was a matter of state law that is usually outside the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, these cases threatened political freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment of the Federal Constituttion.

Thus the First Amendment should be held to prohibit state damage judgments against a national organizations unless there is proof that it specifically authorized or ratified the illegal conduct, he said.

Robert L. Carter of New York argued the case for the N.A.A.C.P. Rlying upon his written brief, Mr. Overstreet's lawyer did not appear before the high court.

Rehearing To Be Sought

Mr. Carter, general counsel for the N.A.A.C.P., commented here yesterday:

"We are of course very much disappointed with the Court's decision today. We will of cour apply for a rehearing. "In any event, this is not a decision on the merit and we will continue to engage in peaceful picketing and other forms of peaceful protests in the furtherance of the civil rights cause."

Aide to Dr. King Released

SAVANNAH, Ga., April 26 (AP).—A top aide to the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. has been released from jail on the condition that he return on May 6 for a hearing on three traffic charges. Hosea L. Williams was jailed briefly Monday night, but released on order of Charles F. Wood, a county commissioner who stipulated that a subpoena obligates Mr. Williams to return. Mr. Williams, an official of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, had refused to post bond, contending he did not commit a crime.

BALTIMORE FREES SIX CORE PICKETS

Judge Removes Restriction at Apartment Building

MOVEMENT

Special to The New York Times

BALTIMORE, May 14 — Six members of the Congress of Racial Equality were released from jail today by a city judge who had charged them earlier with contempt for breaking restrictions imposed against picketing an apartment house.

The six celebrated with an hour's demonstration against Horizon House, high-rise project that stands as a CORE symbol of segregated housing in the city.

Their release came after city officials asked Judge Charles D. Harris to modify his injunction, which restricted picketing to 2 to 5 P.M. on Sundays.

Judge Harris announced that he would temporarily lift restrictions until Monday, when lawyers for the city, CORE and owners of the apartment meet to decide what, if any, modifications can be made in the original order.

Among those released from jail today were Lincoln O. Lynch, 46 years old, associate national director of CORE's New York headquarters, and Stuart Wechsler, 23, also of New York, a field worker for the organization.

Mayor Insistent

Judge Harris's about-face was prompted by Joseph Allen, City Solicitor and a former associate of Judge Harris on the bench, at the insistence of Mayor Theodore R. McKeldin.

Last night in New York, Floyd B. McKissick, CORE's national director, threatened to marshal all 200 local chapters of the organization for possible convergence on Baltimore to protest the court's injunction.

In April Mr. McKissick announced that Baltimore would be CORE's "target city" in a war on discrimination this summer. He said the injunction could affect all future demonstrations if it was allowed to stand.

In a statement released at noon today, Judge Harris said all restrictions would be lifted until after Monday's meeting by lawyers. He added that the six prisoners arrested Thursday and yesterday had been released "to relieve existing tensions."

Klansmen Turn Up

Orderly demonstrations by CORE's local chapter started weeks ago in front of the commercial dwelling. But on May 1 they took a more dramatic turn when members of the Ku Klux Klan, wearing hooded robes, set up counterpicketing on the same street corner.

Carrying anti-Negro placards, Klansmen brought along what they called their own security guard. Despite the presence of 20 city policemen, three large dogs, led by booted, gray-clad Klansmen, patrolled the picket lines.

Lawyers for Horizon House asked Judge Harris on May 6 to enjoin demonstrators because of a "threat of violence and disorder."

In a telegram to Mayor McKeldin, local CORE leaders charged the court with "unconstitutionally blackmailing Baltimore's 350,000 Negro citizens" by preventing "their freedom to protest against the injustice of segregation."

The civil rights group urged the Mayor to "exert your leadership through meaningful immediate action before an explosive situation develops in Baltimore that is no longer controllable."

Mr. Lynch and Mr. Wechsler joined three CORE pickets in defiance of the order on Thursday, saying they were not testing the injunction, but merely "exercising our constitutional rights."

They were arrested and jailed when they refused to promise not to return. On Friday, four more pickets arrested at Horizon House joined the pair in jail, including James Griffin, 37, local CORE chairman, and Willard Dixon, 18, both of whom had been arrested the day before.

SNCC Dumps Top Leaders, May Push Black Pantherism

MOVEMENT AJ 5/17/66

By JACK NELSON
Los Angeles Times News Service

The already-militant Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has unceremoniously dumped its two top leaders in favor of younger Negroes who apparently will more aggressively promote Black Panther politics.

The shakeup, which saw longtime leaders John Lewis and James Forman replaced by Stokely Carmichael and Mrs. Ruby Doris Robinson, coincided with SNCC's emerging policy of deemphasizing involvement of whites in the civil rights movement in the South.

Carmichael, 25, of New York City, has been the committee's senior field secretary in Alabama where he has organized and promoted all Negro political movements under a Black Panther emblem. He replaces Lewis, 26, as chairman.

Mrs. Robinson, of Atlanta, a graduate of Spelman College, has worked with SNCC since 1960 when as a 17-year-old high school senior she took part in some of the earlier sit-ins. She succeeded Forman, 37, as executive secretary.

ELECTIONS, held in an all-night session near Nashville Saturday but not announced until Monday, cast the student group further adrift from the main stream of the civil rights movement.

Lewis, obviously bitter over his ouster, has been SNCC's main link to the more conventional activities of the movement. He is the member of the executive board of Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference and has been SNCC's ceremonial head and spokesman since 1963. He has represented the committee with the National Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and in White House meetings between civil rights leaders and the President.

Sources in other civil rights organizations interpreted the change in officers to mean a more militant and, perhaps, Black Nationalist orientation for SNCC.

Some sources in the movement earlier had sharply criticized SNCC for its Black Panther activities in Alabama. Hosea Williams, a top aide to Dr. King, calling it "reverse racism," said, "they've run some of the white people out of the movement."

CARMICHAEL, considered one of SNCC's more radical leaders, got his start as an activist in the protest movement while in high school in New York.

In Lowndes County, Alabama, Carmichael helped form the Freedom Organization, an all-Negro party under the Black Panther emblem. He called the move necessary because white Democrats in Lowndes had excluded Negroes from party activities and added:

"To ask the Negroes to get in the Democratic party is like asking Jews to join the Nazi party."

Lewis and Forman were elected to the central committee, but this may have been little more than a face-saving gesture to two veteran civil rights leaders who had been beaten and jailed many times in the South. There are eight other members on the committee.

Lewis, who has been arrested 40 times in civil rights demonstrations, suffered a fractured skull in March, 1965, while attempting to lead a voting rights demonstration at Selma.

JULIAN BOND, SNCC communications director, said the change in leadership will mean more emphasis on organization and administration, something he said SNCC feels is necessary if Negroes are to gain political power in black belt counties where they have voting majorities.

A summer voting project scheduled for Alabama probably will be directed by about 60 volunteers, all Negroes, he said.

"This is not racism," he said. "The big trouble in the past is the White Northern volunteers work for a summer and then go home, leaving a gap. We hope to recruit Negroes who will stay and work all the time."

Negro Help Listed By Commerce Aide

By MICHAEL DAVIS

Eugene P. Foley, assistant secretary of commerce, told a group of Atlanta Negro businessmen Friday that the day has come when the Negro wants to do something more than protest and prosecute the cause of civil rights in the courts.

He addressed the closing session of a three-day economic development institute sponsored jointly by the National Urban League and the National Business League.

AGENCIES EXPLAINED

Foley explained the existence of a number of federal agencies created to extend credit to Negroes and other individuals who wish to strike out and create small businesses of their own.

"Like everyone else," said Foley, "the Negro has a need to create something positive, something concrete and what is holding him back more than anything else is the lack of economic tools to get started."

Foley, former administrator of the Small Business Administration, cited examples where economic aid from the federal government has been instrumental in fostering the birth and the growth of private business.

THE MIDDLE CLASS

Foley said he was sure that integration was going to come from the middle-class Negroes in America. He said this group has served traditionally as the springboard for ethnic assimilation and that the Negro middle class will be the group that will move to the suburbs and subsequently into the mainstream of American life.

He predicted that poorer Negroes, as poor members of other ethnic groups, will have a tendency to stay fairly close to other members of their group and that this in itself will have a tendency to preserve the racial ghettos that exist in many regions.

For this reason, Foley urged that "we make the ghetto livable during the period of transition by providing jobs and economic resources for private enterprise."

Julian Bond to Quit SNCC And Write Book, Paper Says

MOVEMENT AC 5/20/66

Rep.-elect Julian Bond is reported to be leaving his job with the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

Bond, SNCC communications director, first will take a leave of absence from the militant organization to write a book, then resign immediately thereafter, The Atlanta Inquirer, a Negro weekly newspaper, reported Thursday. Bond is a former editor of the Inquirer.

Bond denied Thursday night that he would resign from SNCC, but said he is planning on taking a leave of absence to work on his book. Asked if he were disturbed by the recent ouster of SNCC Chairman John Lewis, Bond said, "No, it's just like the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce. They have an election every year, and so do we."

Bond, a Negro, was denied his seat in the Georgia House last January because he endorsed a SNCC statement opposing the war in Viet Nam and counseling avoiding the military draft.

He was reelected in a special election, and again challenged by some members of the House. The House Rules Committee will conduct hearings beginning Monday at 10 a.m. to decide whether Bond will be sworn in as a representative.

Although Bond is one of the founders of SNCC, the Inquirer said, he will take a 60 to 90-day leave of absence to write the book, then resign.

The title of Bond's book: "The Georgia House Is Not a Home."

The Inquirer also reported that James Forman, who did not seek reelection as executive secretary of SNCC, remains one of the organization's guiding figures. Forman, 37, has been named national office manager.

It was learned Thursday that SNCC is purging its organization of most of its white workers.

"When a baby is little, it needs someone to teach it how to eat," one SNCC official said in explaining the ouster of white civil rights workers. "This baby is now big enough to eat by itself."

The SNCC official did not want his name used.

A white magazine reporter visited SNCC headquarters in Selma, Ala., Thursday and was told that henceforth SNCC would deal only with Negro newsmen.

Bill Mahoney, who apparently has taken over the job of publicity for SNCC in Bond's absence, said there apparently was some misunderstanding about the Selma incident. However, he also refused to give any specific information about SNCC activities to an Atlanta reporter.

NEGRO BUSINESSES URGED TO EXPAND

Tradesmen Told They Must Seek Out White Markets

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, May 21 — About 300 Negro businessmen ended an unusual conference this week. They heard speakers urge them, on the one hand, to go after the "total market," and, on the other, to acknowledge that Negroes would probably be their best market for some time to come.

The businessmen, ranging from shopowners and insurance salesmen to bankers, attended a three-day Economic Development Institute at the American Motor Hotel sponsored by the National Urban League and the National Business League. Government, academic and business representatives also took part.

Workshop sessions included such subjects as how a community might organize a commercial bank, a credit union, an investment club or a mortgage brokerage concern.

Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, told the businessmen that they must now compete on an equal basis with white businessmen, must be alert to trends in advertising and public relations, and must join trade associations.

"Negroes will not respond to racial appeals by their businessmen any more," he declared. "They will buy where the price and the goods and the service are right. And Negro businessmen must attempt to penetrate the whole market and not restrict themselves to a fast-shrinking 'captive market.'"

Need for Skills Cited

In many cases, Mr. Young continued, Negro companies have not developed the managerial skills necessary for successful competition.

"Unless we develop a strong business community," he said, "we will be frustrated in our attempts to close the gap in income and status which now exists."

In Harlem, Mr. Young said, only 18 per cent of the businesses are Negro-owned and operated. Negro family income has moved past the $4,000 level but the Negro business community "has a long way to go before we can reap the benefits of this economic boom," he said.

Dr. James Green, an economics professor at the University of Georgia, suggested that Negro businessmen were neglecting opportunities in urban renewal areas. He said Negro efforts in the past had been limited by such factors as social rigidities and the persistence of agrarian values.

"The rules of the economic game have changed quite sharply in favor of Negro entrepreneurship," Dr. Green asserted. "Some will say the door to Negro entrepreneurship is still not open far enough, but once you've got a foot in the door the job is more than half done."

Frank L. Stanley, publisher of The Louisville Defender, who is president of National Newspaper Publishers Association, urged small businesses that could afford little advertising to pool their funds for joint advertisements appealing to whites as well as Negroes. He stressed the size of the Negro market.

"When considering 11 per cent of the population it does not seem to be too important a factor," he said. "However, when you consider that the Negro is concentrated in 78 markets, and here becomes more than 25 per cent of the population, it must take on added importance."

New Leaders and New Course for 'Snick'

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, May 21—The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee ("Snick") changed its top command this week and, in doing so, publicly acknowledged that a major shift in its civil rights philosophy has taken place.

Voted out of the committee chairmanship was John Lewis, a 26-year-old minister who believes in nonviolence as both a "way of life" and as a way of forcing concessions from the "white power structure" in the South.

The new chairman is Stokley Carmichael, who at 24, is disillusioned with using nonviolent protest to force integration from reluctant white communities. Mr. Carmichael does not advocate violence, but neither does he believe in turning the other cheek. And, above all, he is opposed to demonstrating in order to force white officials to accept Negroes in the white schools or other public facilities. This, he believes, demeans the Negro by making it appear that white facilities are best simply because they are frequented by whites. "White schools are best all right," Mr. Carmichael says, "but only because they get more money than the Negro schools."

Associated Press

'BLACK PANTHER': The shift from mixed white and Negro to all-Negro participation in the civil rights movement in the South was dramatized last week when Stokley Carmichael, organizer of Alabama's all-Negro "Black Panther" political party, was chosen to head the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

Third Parties

What Mr. Carmichael proposes is that Negroes form independent or "third" political parties and seize political power in areas where he headed Snick operations idea he began to put into practice in Alabama in Lowndes County—when he headed Snick operations—with a militant all-Negro party under the emblem of the "Black Panther." This, the theory goes, will force whites to bargain with Negroes—rather than vice versa—and also will make it possible for Negroes to use public funds to equalize schools and other facilities.

All of this, of course, presupposes that Negroes will win political power. And, as Mr. Carmichael and the student committee see it, this cannot be done by working within the Democratic or Republican parties, which they regard as "racist" and hopelessly middle class. "To ask Negroes to get in the Democratic party," Mr. Carmichael said recently, "is like asking Jews to join the Nazi party."

What the committee wants are independent parties at the city and county levels. They would be run by and for poor people, and would not hesitate to tear down existing political institutions which the student committee feels are being used to "exploit" poor Negroes.

In organizing the Negroes into the "Poor People's" parties, the student committee will abandon its long-time policy of using integrated civil rights teams. "We will not fire any of our white organizers," Mr. Carmichael says, "but if they want to organize, they can organize white people. Negroes will organize the Negroes."

The new philosophy is a major development in the civil rights movement because it stands in such sharp contrast to the philosophy of the committee when it was organized in 1960 by Southern students—both Negro and white. Then the committee dreamed of integration as an end in itself. Committee members believed it could be achieved by love, conscience and morality if people were willing to risk their lives in nonviolent protest.

In Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia and other parts of the South, student committee members showed that there was no risk they would not take. They sat-in, kneeled-in and marched, and were arrested, jailed and beaten by segregationist whites who often were supported by Southern policemen, courts and the full weight of state government.

New Philosophy

Although publications like the Trotskyite "Militant" and the Communist party's "Worker" could be found from the beginning in pockets of some committee members, their popularity increased as the committee penetrated deeper into Mississippi and the Alabama Black Belt. And few committee members were more interested in the search for a new philosophy than Mr. Carmichael, a Howard University graduate who started reading Marxist literature while in high school in New York.

But while Mr. Carmichael and his supporters feel, for example, that there is a bond between the American Negro and the Vietcong, they say they prefer their own dialectic to any ready-made one they have come across.

Mr. Carmichael refers to Communists as "stale guys" who are still advocating "outmoded plans" for eradicating poverty and promoting equality. "We don't have any master plans," says Mr. Carmichael. "We just believe in putting power in the hands of the poor and letting them make their own plans."

SNCC Attacks LBJ On Racial Meeting

By the Associated Press

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, de-emphasizing integration as a goal, rejected Monday any participation in the White House conference on civil rights. SNCC implied the conference seeks to recover U.S. prestige damaged by war efforts.

SNCC labeled the planned conference useless and unnecessary.

In a statement read at a news conference, SNCC said the civil rights meeting was called by President Lyndon B. Johnson "at a time when United States prestige internationally is at a low ebb due to our involvement in the Viet Nam civil war, the Dominican Republican, the Congo, South Africa and other parts of the world.

"We cannot be a party to attempts by the White House to use black Americans to recoup a loss of prestige internationally."

Mrs. Clifford Robinson, recently elected SNCC executive secretary in a leadership change, read the statement. She said SNCC feels the White House conference would be used to give what the organization considers a false image of racial progress and good will.

THE STATEMENT said:

"Regardless of the proposals which stem from this conference, we know that the executive department and the President are not serious about insuring constitutional rights to black Americans."

SNCC said there have been beatings and jailings of Negroes by police who "were, in effect, given a blank check by the executive department of this government to inflict these lawless acts upon Negroes."

Stokely Carmichael, 24, a native of Trinidad, West Indies, the new chairman of SNCC, said integration is merely a "subterfuge for white supremacy." He said integration is irrelevant.

"That's not our problem — to initiate it anymore," he said. "Political and economic power are what's important."

The former SNCC chairman, John R. Lewis, declined privately to comment further on the statement. He has attended several White House conferences in the past as SNCC chairman.

But Carmichael told a newsman it made no difference who was chairman because the staff on SNCC decided against participation in the conference this year.

In a statement, Lewis said there was no schism or conflict within SNCC. "I will continue to be a participant in SNCC and in the struggle," he said.

Rights Unit Quits White House Parley

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, May 23 — The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee said today that it was withdrawing from the White House Conference on Civil Rights, scheduled for June 1 and 2.

A statement by the organization's central committee said that President Johnson was not serious about insuring constitutional rights of Negroes. It said the Federal Government had done nothing about the beating, jailing and murdering of Negroes and civil rights workers.

Furthermore, the statement said, the conference had been called when the nation's prestige was suffering because of United States involvement in Vietnam, the Dominican Republic, the Congo, South Africa "and other parts of the Third [nonwhite) World."

"We cannot be a party to attempts by the White House to use black Americans to recoup a loss of prestige internationally," the statement said.

"Our organization is opposed to the war in Vietnam," the statement continued, "and we cannot in good consience meet with the chief policymaker of the Vietnam War to discuss human rights in this country when he flagrantly violates the human rights of colored people in Vietnam."

The committee's withdrawal, announced at a press conference at its headquarters here, reduces the representation of the militant left at the conference.

The conference, which is to submit proposals to President Johnson, was designed to attract a cross-section of American life. Some 2,400 persons hav been invited and all the major civil rights groups have participated in its planning. Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago and North Western Railway, is the conference chair man.

John Lewis, chairman of the student committee until he was voted out of office last week, was a member of the 29-member council that met each weekend for the last two months to draft proposals for the conference.

Reconideration Urged

Mr. Lewis was at today's news conference but had nothing to say. He remains a mem ber of the committee's central committee and he signed the withdrawal statement, along with Stokley Carmichael, the new chairman.

Mr. Heineman, learning in advance of the student committee's possible withdrawal said he hoped it would reconsider because he believed it could make a contribution to the conference.

The withdrawal is in keeping with the committee's new spirit

Mr. Carmichael, 24 years old, said today of white liberals that "liberalism is an extension of paternalism." Liberals do not want Negroes to be truly independent, as they must becom he said.

Mr. Carmichael said "The goa of integration is irrelevant. Political and economic power is what black people have to have."

The committee's statement announcing withdrawal from the conference said:

"The foundation and consequences of racism are not rooted in the behavior of black Americans, yesterday or today. They are rooted in an attempt by Europeans and white American to exploit and dehumanize the descendants of Africa for monetary gain. This process of universal exploitation of Africa and her descendants continues today by the power elite of this country.

"In the process of exploiting black Americans, white Ameri has tried to shift responsibility for the degrading position in which blacks now find themselves away from the oppressors to the oppressed.

"The White House conference, especially with its original focus problem with which America on the Negro family as the mai must deal, accentuates this process of shifting the burden of the problem."

SNCC Drops Integration for Economic and Political Goal

By JOE BROWN

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is no longer interested in integration but now seeks political and economic power for Negroes, the chairman of the militant civil rights group said Monday.

"The role of integration is irrelevant. That's not our goal," newly elected SNCC Chairman Stokely Carmichael, 24, told newsmen in Atlanta.

He warned that if the group cannot obtain its aims through peaceful means it may resort to violence.

SNCC will concentrate on building the "Black Panther Party," said Carmichael adding, "It is already a reality."

"We will vote for the candidates we can control," he said. "SNCC has to give the Negroes across the country something they don't have to beg for."

Carmichael said the group would not object to Negroes living in ghettoes as long as the area was controlled by Negroes.

"The Jews own their own ghettoes. The Negroes do not," he said.

At the same press conference SNCC released a statement bitterly denouncing the Johnson administration and a proposed White House Conference of civil rights.

The statement read by SNCC Executive Secretary Ruby Doris Robinson said, in part, SNCC "believes the White House Conference entitled 'To Secure These Rights' is absolutly unnecessary and rejects its invitation to participate in the useless endeavor . . ."

"Regardless of the proposals which stem from this conference, we know the Executive Department and the President are not serious about insuring constitutional rights to black Americans," Mrs. Robinson said.

The statement charges, "The President has called this conference within the United States at a time when United States prestige internationally is at a low ebb due to our involvement in the Viet Nam Civil War, the Dominican Republic, the Congo, South Africa and other parts of the third world.

Court's Picket Rule Called Rights Peril

WASHINGTON (AP) — The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People told the Supreme Court Wednesday its very survival—and that of the entire civil rights movement—may have been imperiled by a recent decision to let an $85,793 Georgia picketing judgment stand.

Asking the justices to reconsider the case, the NAACP said the high court's action opened the door to damage suits which could "harass, impoverish and eventually paralyze" the organization.

The Supreme Court dismissed without explanation April 27 an NAACP appeal from a Georgia ruling that the national association can be held liable for picketing ordered by its Savannah branch.

The 5-4 ruling produced a furious dissent by Justice William O. Douglas, who warned that "juries might run pell-mell" to destroy "unpopular groups" like the NAACP.

The NAACP had argued that it had no control over the picketing of a Savannah grocery store whose owner sued it, the local branch and local offices for damages.

Since the decision was announced, the NAACP said in a brief filed with the high court, it has been named a defendant with the local branch in a similar suit in Virginia and has been threatened with a third such suit in Philadelphia.

The NAACP brief gave no details of the cases, but an official told a reporter that in one the owner of a Victoria, Va., department store is asking $100,000 in punitive damages as a result of pamphlets passed out in front of his store.

In the Philadelphia suit, the official said, nursing homes which were picketed have threatened to sue for $100,000 in damages.

"If, in less than a month," the NAACP brief said, "petitioner has already incurred the onerous obligation of defending two such actions involving activities of its local branches, the course of future events is not difficult to anticipate."

Throughout the country, the civil rights organization continued, people "antagonistic" to its work and goals "have seen and will continue to see in this court's action yet another device with which petitioner and its affiliate branches may be harassed and their work — and indeed that of the entire civil rights movement — impeded, if not completely halted."

On the local level, the NAACP said, branches can no longer assume that peaceful protests will not subject them, their officers and the national organization to suits for damages.

As of April 30, the NAACP continued, it had an accumulated deficit of $112,899.60 "and the issue of its basic survival has been very much in doubt unless the financial situation materially improves."

Now, the NAACP said, the Georgia ruling requires it to take on "an impossible financial and structural burden which, as a practical matter, would drain all the personnel and funds of the local affiliates and national organization."

Rights Group Kills Viet War Protest

AC 6/3/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—The White House Conference on Civil Rights shoved aside dissatisfaction from the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) Thursday and gave overwhelming support to the Johnson administration.

The conference, at the conclusion of a two-day session brushed aside a CORE resolution calling for withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Viet Nam.

One of the 12 committees, where votes were taken on resolutions, adopted another resolution on Viet Nam following the policy of President Lyndon B. Johnson. When the CORE resolution on Viet Nam was presented to other committees, the motions were either ruled out of order or were shouted down.

Committees also adopted numerous other resolutions which had the substance of endorsing the conference council's 100 page report to improve Negro economic and social levels.

The afternoon conference "consensus" came after a number of top administration leaders, including UN ambassador Arthur Goldberg, made the rounds at the 12 committee sessions Thursday morning.

Goldberg told a press conference that he did not think the Viet Nam war is affecting the civil rights cause at home.

CORE director Floyd McKissick said Thursday morning that his organization would make a major effort to pass a Viet Nam resolution and others at the concluding committee sessions. The CORE effort fizzled by the afternoon.

Other administration leaders who visited committee sessions Thursday morning were Robert Weaver, Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development; John Connor, Secretary of Commerce; and UN representative James Roosevelt.

A committee which shouted down the CORE resolution on Viet Nam when presented by McKissick adopted another resolution urging the "President to continue and intensfy his efforts to bring the war in Viet Nam to an early and honorable end so that a greater level of federal funds may be devoted to fulfilling these rights."

J. M. Nabrit Jr., this country's Number Two man at the UN and a native of Atlanta, presided over that committee.

Another committee, presided over by Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, president of Morehouse College in Atlanta, adopted a series of resolutions aimed at assisting Alabama Negroes, who might be forced from farms and other employment because they voted in recent elections.

T. Y. Rogers of Tuscaloosa, Alabama, president of the Confederation of Alabama Political Organizations, said: "We just lost the primary and a run off." Rogers said there is fear of massive displacement of Negroes in Alabama's Black Belt because they voted in the elections.

"It is already beginning to happen," he said.

Doomed Literacy Drive

Powell's Pressure on Poverty Office To Withhold Funds Believed Decisive

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, July 5 — Political pressure crushed James Farmer's proposed project to combat illiteracy with an $860,000 antipoverty grant. Sargent Shriver, director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, was on the verge of signing the grant more than six months ago, but outside forces deterred him. Subordinates in the agency pointed to Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan, as the pressure point.

News Analysis

In the interval, Mr. Shriver spurned all of Mr. Farmer's efforts to communicate with him. Mr. Farmer, the former national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, called the antipoverty agency's inaction a "betrayal" and said he was withdrawing the proposal.

Mr. Powell, Mr. Shriver and agency spokesmen take bland public positions on the controversy. Political pressure is not something people in politics discuss in public unless they are girded for a public fight and are ready to take the consequences.

However, the demands made by Mr. Powell in his powerful role as chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee make common conversation among subordinates of Mr. Shriver. Democrats on Mr. Powell's committee and other leading Democrats in Congress know about some of these pressures.

Mr. Powell was reported today to be out of the city. His administrative assistant, C. Sumner Stone, would say for the record only that "the chairman received a number of telephone calls from Congressmen saying that they were opposed to it [the literacy project]."

Committee Chairman Strong

A committee chairman is in a strong position to enforce his demands because he can affect the course and character of legislation under his jurisdiction. For example, Mr. Powell probably has the power to transfer significant antipoverty agency operations to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and leave Mr. Shriver holding a half-empty shell.

What is not entirely clear is Mr. Powell's motivation in this case. His opposition to Mr. Farmer's proposal was implied, though never publicly expressed, when he announced last March that he proposed to amend the antipoverty law to give a big literacy project to the Depart-dications that the President was still interested.

The proposal went through extensive processing. Last December, newspaper articles reported that Mr. Farmer was going to resign as CORE director to head a literacy project. Mr. Farmer, while annoyed by what he considered premature publicity, did not deny it and resigned his CORE position.

The project was so close to approval that newsmen were told one day in December or January that the announcement might come that afternoon.

The project was discussed in January or February at a White House meeting attended by President Johnson, Mr. Powell, Representative Sam M. Gibbons, Democrat of Florida who is chairman of the Antipoverty subcommittee; Charles L. Schultze, budget director, and others. The decisions, if any, were never made known.

However, some unexplained delays developed at the antipoverty office. Mr. Shriver found flaws in the proposal and sent it down the executive line for changes. He wanted a sponsorship that was broader than civil rights leadership. He wanted individuals who were identified with education added to the project's board of directors.

All these and other objections were met. Mr. Farmer, unaware that the problem was political, laid plans to move from New York to Washington. His wife signed a paper for the purchase of a house, but no money changed hands.

At that point, March 7, Mr. Powell made known his inclination to favor Health, Education and Welfare with a big literacy project.

On March 30, Mr. Farmer checked with Bernard L. Boutin, at that time the deputy director of the Office of Economic Opportunity. Mr. Farmer said Mr. Boutin had told him that the proposal had run into trouble "in the committee." No names were mentioned.

Mr. Shriver, nevertheless, permitted his staff to continue processing and reprocessing Mr. Farmer's proposal. Some weeks ago, the staff completed the work and sent the proposal to Mr. Shriver with a memorandum that said, "This project is ready for funding." The grant figure was reduced to $780,000.

Mr. Shriver scratched on the same sheet, "Anybody who thinks this is out of his head," and shuttled it back to Theodore M. Berry, Director of Community Action.

RESIGNS FROM CORE: Lillian Smith, the writer, has quit the advisory committee of the rights group charging that "haters" and "nihilists" now control it.

CORE IS ASSAILED BY LILLIAN SMITH

Author Attacks Leadership and Resigns as Adviser

Lillian Smith, the author, quit the advisory committee of the Congress of Racial Equality yesterday, charging that "nihilists" and "old-fashioned haters" had taken over the organization.

The 68-year-old white author, who wrote "Strange Fruit,, and other works dealing with the Negro's struggle for equality, wired her resignation to Floyd B. McKissick, CORE's new national director.

Miss Smith, who lives at Clayton, Ga., said: "I strongly protest the dangerous and unwise position CORE has taken on the use of violence in effecting racial change. I am therefore resigning."

Refers to 'Black Power'

She referred to the new militant advocacy o "black power" by CORE and to statements by Mr. McKissick that the doctrine of nonviolence had outlived its usefulness.

Miss Smith has worked with CORE since 1946 and has been a member of its advisory committee for more than nine years. Earlier this year, she was critical of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, another Negro civil rights group, which she had long befriended.

According to Mr. McKissick, CORE opposes the initiation of violence by its members and only invokes the right of self-defense against attack. But Miss Smith, in her wire, charged, "CORE has been infiltrated by adventurers and by nihilists, black nationalists and plain old-fashioned haters who

Farmer Will Be Consultant in Fight on Adult Illiteracy

By Walter H. Waggoner
Special to The New York Times

TRENTON, July 5 — James Farmer, former national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, has been hired as special consultant on adult illiteracy for New Jersey's anti-overty program.

Mr. Farmer broke angrily with the Office of Economic Opportunity, the national antipoverty agency, over the weekend when he charged that it had failed to support the new Center for Community Action Education, an organization he headed in the belief that it would be backed in its first year with $860,000 in Federal money.

The New Jersey Office of Economic Opportunity announced today that Mr. Farmer would prepare, within the next several weeks, a report that would form the basis of action by Gov. Richard J.Hughes' Tak Force on Adult Literacy Opportunities.

The task force, headed by Dean Ernest McMahon of Rutgers, the State University, has been granted $150,000 by the Legislature to carry out res on adult illiteracy and to establish experimental programs for alleviating it.

John C. Bullitt, the state antipoverty director, said Mr. Farmer was retained because of "his deep personal interest and understanding of the problems of the disadvantaged in our society."

"Mr. Farmer's advice will make an outstanding contribution to the task force's charge of developing the most effective and widespread adult literacy program possible," Mr. Bullitt declared.

A spokesman for the state antipoverty agency said, it was estimated there were 750,000 adult illiterates in Jersey, "a large number for a population of less than 7 million." The national illiteracy figure is estimated at 11 million.

A spokesman for the state program said there was no connection between Mr. Farmer's break with the Federal Office of Economic Opportunity and his appointment by New Jersey. The spokesman said that Mr. Farmer had discussed the prospect during three visits to the O.E.O. office in Trenton early last month and that an agreement to put him to work on a temporary basis for the state was reached June 18.

Mr. Farmer is expected to work nearly full time for much of July and August at a consultant's fee of $80 a day.

His activities will include research and statistical analysis of the state's illiteracy problem—"finding out who and where the adult illiterates are," a spokesman said.

Mr. Farmer will also evaluate Jersey's existing programs for reaching the poor, and will canvass some of the efforts being made across the country, to determine what might be most useful here.

He said he was approaching foundations and industry and labor groups in an attempt to get funds for his work on a nationwide scale. He declared that he had been "encouraged" by the results, adding that "some have expressed interest, although we have not yet got down to brass tacks."

know about some of these pressures.

Mr. Powell was reported today to be out of the city. His administrative assistant, C. Sumner Stone, would say for the record only that "the chairman received a number of telephone calls from Congressmen saying that they were opposed to it [the literacy project]."

For example, Mr. Powell probably has the power to transfer significant antipoverty agency operations to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and leave Mr. Shriver holding a half-empty shell.

His opposition to Mr. Farmer's proposal was implied, though never publicly expressed, when he announced last March that he proposed to amend the antipoverty law to give a big literacy project to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

When Mr. Powell was asked about Mr. Farmer's project, he said variously, "No comment" and "That's a matter for administrative decision."

Mr. Shriver, however, is known to have asked Mr. Powell in Mr. Powell's office what he held against Mr. Farmer.

Mr. Powell, a Harlem minister, is reported to have placed his hand on a Bible and with tongue in cheek said, "I don't even know the —."

But Mr. Powell's purposes remain in the speculative area, and speculation runs to a belief that Mr. Farmer either had failed to pay obeisance to an important committee chairman or that Mr. Powell had sensed a political threat in Mr. Farmer's activities. Both are prominent in the Negro community.

To Mr. Farmer, the bitter irony is that the project was conceived in the White House. Mr. Farmer was there on Dec. 6, 1963, at the invitation of President Johnson.

He said he had told the President, "We must continue to knock down the barriers and must add to that fight a national literacy program and remedial education."

Mr. Farmer said the President had agreed and had asked for a memorandum detailing how such a program could be set up. Mr. Farmer submitted three memoranda in October of 1964, when he believed the national political situation was settled. On Aug. 17, 1965, he submitted a firm proposal to the antipoverty agency. The White House acknowledged all these communications, with insigned a paper for the purchase of a house, but no money changed hands.

At that point, March 7, Mr. Powell made known his inclination to favor Health, Education and Welfare with a big literacy project.

On March 30, Mr. Farmer checked with Bernard L. Boutin, at that time the deputy director of the Office of Economic Opportunity. Mr. Farmer said Mr. Boutin had told him that the proposal had run into trouble "in the committee." No names were mentioned.

Mr. Shriver, nevertheless, permitted his staff to continue processing and reprocessing Mr. Farmer's proposal. Mr. Shriver scratched on the same sheet, "Anybody who thinks this is out of his head," and shuttled it back to Theodore M. Berry, Director of Community Action.

What went on in the last few days was little more than academic. Mr. Farmer assailed Mr. Shriver for "double talk" and said he was withdrawing the proposal.

Hyman H. Bookbinder, a special assistant to Mr. Shriver, have been funded" and that he knew of no mayors who had opposed the project, as Mr. Farmer had contended.

The antipoverty agency's public position that "it was Farmer who withdrew it, not O.E.O. that denied it" is a bureaucratic technicality. The project could have been revived because Mr. Shriver had not advised Mr. Farmer that he had killed it.

Mr. Farmer was president of the Center for Community-Action Education. The directors included university presidents, foundation officials and other prominent persons.

Mr. Farmer, reached in New York today, said:

"What I object to most is not O.E.O.'s failure to fund the project. That is Mr. Shriver's administrative prerogative. But I object to his failure to say anything for months and months.

"An O.E.O. spokesman now implies in the press that there are still unmet conditions. If that is true, then O.E.O. deserves censure for not communicating those to me. Why should they keep the requirements secret from the only person who can meet them?

"As a matter of fact, we were told months ago by O.E.O. staff persons that there were no other conditions which we had not met and no conditions have been brought to our attention since."

Miss Smith, who wrote "Killers of the Dream" dealing with white supremacy in the South, described the new leaders of CORE as "new killers of the dream." She said that CORE had once refused tactics "dictated by anger and hate." But white Americans, because of their inertia or their violence, "must carry much of the moral burden" for CORE's new tactics, she added.

She blamed the "stubbornness and dishonest methods of segregationists, the violence of the [Ku Klux] Klan, and the blind complacency of many white church people." These factors made it easy for the "haters" to take over from wiser and more patient leadership, she said.

DR. KING RECEIVES $100,000 DONATION

Gift From Swedish People Is Single Largest Gift

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. received a check for $100,000 yesterday from the people of Sweden for the work he is doing with the Southern Christian Leadership Council. It is the largest single contribution ever given to the Civil rights organization.

The money is part of a fund set up in Sweden, the Martin Luther King Fund of Sweden, from the proceeds of a concert and a recording Dr. King and Harry Belafonte, the singer, made last March in Sweden.

The check made out to Dr. King was presented to him by the Swedish Consul General Tore Tollroth at the Swedish Building, 8 East 69th Street.

Mr. Tollroth noted that this was not all of the funds that would be received by Dr. King and his group. He said the people of all the Scandinavian countries were behind Dr. King and his movement "for justice without ever resorting to violence or letting loose the forces of hate."

Dr. King said the money would be used mainly in the voter registration drive in Mississippi and to help the housing, economic and slum drive in Chicago, a program that he called "one of our most important this summer."

Dr. King took issue with Floyd B. McKissick, the director of the Congress of Racial Equality, and statements he made on Monday concerning "black power," the war in Vietnam and the Selective Service system.

Dr. King said he did not like the term "black power" because of the semantics involved. "It connotates black supremacy and an anti-white feeling that does not or should not prevail," he said. "It leaves a feeling that the Negro wants to go it alone, which he can not do. It also carries implications of Black Nationalism."

When asked about Mr. McKissick's statements that CORE would support those persons who did not want to serve in Vietnam, Dr. King said he believed the CORE leader meant to support those who wished to be conscientious objectors.

"The right to be a consciencious objector is provided for in the Selective Service Act and it should be honored. If though, he meant to help people dodge the draft I could not agree."

"I cannot agree with the teaching of defensive violence," Dr. King said. "People will defend themselves anyway.

"I can understand why CORE feels the way it does, but I cannot agree. We do not need to have a program for defense. The line of demarkation between defensive and aggressive violence is too thin."

FOR NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE MOVEMENT

It's 'We Shall Overcome' —At the Pay Window

AC 6/12/66

By JOHN ASKINS

The National Urban League is a different sort of civil rights organization.

It doesn't picket, sit in, lie in, or march. Its battlegrounds historically have been the conference tables of big business, where the traditional "We Shall Overcome" might be translated as "We Shall Achieve More Job Opportunities for Negroes."

Not that the organization isn't as eager as any for an end to discrimination in all areas of American life where discrimination exists. But the focus has been on economics.

As National Deputy Director M. T. Puryear put it Friday night in the annual meeting of the Atlanta Urban League: "The other groups end at the bargaining table, where the Urban League begins."

Because of its approach, the league has had its share of criticism from the more militant groups. But its defense has always been that the gains won in the streets will be of little use without the skills and training to take advantage of them.

AND AT LEAST some of the other civil rights groups are beginning to agree tentatively. The Southern Christian Leadership Conference for the past four years has been conducting citizenship education schools for "grass roots" Negroes, and the week-long schools offer liberal doses of practical economics. The Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, too, recently gave integration a back seat in favor of politics and economics.

Because the focus now — thanks partly to the federal government, and partly to the outbreaks of violence in Watts, Harlem and other ghettos—is on poverty, and the realization is that no people can long sustain an interest in voting if there is not enough food on the table.

The other organizations have some distance to go, however, before they catch up with the Urban League in sheer number and variety of programs. The annual report of the Atlanta office, issued Friday night, listed these projects:

—Assistance to dispossessed families and new arrivals in finding adequate housing.

—The encouragement of profit-making and nonprofit organizations that will build low and moderate-income housing.

—Support for city improvements like parks and recreational facilities, hospitals and health centers, street widening and neighborhood rehabilitation.

—A DEMONSTRATION project designed to strengthen the family life of parents in poverty areas, known as Project ENABLE (Education and Neighborhood Action for Better Living Environment).

—The acquaintance of youngsters with "industry in action" by taking them on visits to local industries and technical schools, the aim being to provide them with first-hand information about the world of work.

—Career guidance conferences and workshops for high school and college students.

—Clerk - typist and secretarial training for deprived persons.

—On - the - job training programs for unemployed and underemployed persons.

—Maintenance of a "reservoir" of skilled-job applicants. The applicants are recruited and catalogued according to skills for placement in better jobs, often involving moving from one part of the country to another.

FOR THE COMING year, the league plans expansion of existing programs and development of new ones, including a human resources and development program in cooperation with the Georgia State Department of Labor's bureau of apprenticeship and training and with Economic Opportunity Atlanta, Inc. This program is designed to help the deprived, criminals, school dropouts and others to become more employable through remedial training, intensive counseling and job placement.

But Mr. Puryear suggested Friday night that all this might not be enough.

"Negro citizens may not be making the progress you think they're making," he said.

"In 1940 the Urban League discovered it was impossible to get a wider variety of jobs because of educational lacks. Eighty per cent of the nation's Negroes were janitors and maids. They made 60 per cent of what other groups made.

"Twenty years later they had picked up three years in education. But now 84 per cent were employed in jobs at the bottom, and their income was only 55 per cent of that of other groups.

"In 1965 they had gained another year and a half in education and their income was $1,500 more than it was in 1940 but now 85 per cent were in jobs at the bottom and their income was only 54 per cent as much as other groups."

Whites' Role Splits Leaders of March

MOVEMENT

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

BATESVILLE, Miss., June 11—Civil rights leaders kept a close watch on the Mississippi segregationists who stood along the marching route to Jackson this week, but what they talked about most often was the Northern white liberal.

"We've received a lot of help from white liberals and we appreciate it," said Floyd B. McKissick, the national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, as he set a brisk pace along Highway 51.

"But the situation is sort of like when you are sick and your neighbor comes in to help you. You need his assistance, but you don't want him to run your house or take your wife."

The scene was typical of the hot, dusty march to Jackson. The marchers are providing the first major convention of civil rights activists since the drive against segregation in Selma, Ala., more than a year ago, and they are taking advantage of it by doing as much talking as walking.

Their philosophical differences are vast and center more than ever before on their relationship to the white man, but the civil rights movement appears to be thriving on the controversy as it did in Selma, Birmingham and in the days of the sit-ins and freedom rides.

The differences of the organizations come into focus even over the make-up of the marching column. Staff workers from the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference are continually thanking Northern white marchers for coming South for the march.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee wonders aloud if whites ought to be on the march at all. Mr. McKissick walks in the middle, welcoming the whites but insisting that the decision-making be done by Negroes.

Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Whitney Young of the Urban League quietly decline to support the march, contending that the march "manifesto" was too critical of President Johnson and society in general and might damage their relationship with the President and liberal Congressmen.

However, there are many areas of agreement among the civil rights leaders and those who are marching are finding them along the way.

Support Is Wanted

The leaders, for example, want the white liberals' financial contributions and moral support, but almost all of them complain as they march that many white civil rights organizers don't "fit in" in the Northern slums and in the rural South. And the steadily dwindling number of white financial supporters, they say, often wants to write civil rights policy along with its checks

"White organizers usually are highly dedicated and worked hard, but some of them just don't understand the problem," said one of Dr. King's top aides. "Instead of drawing the Negro community together, they divide it by trying to make too many decisions.

"We can understand why Snick [The Student Committee] no longer will let whites organize in rural areas, but we don't agree that it's wise to make such a hard and fast rule. We are just becoming more selective about the whites we use."

"We've got some white people on our staff who have stuck with us through thick and thin," said Mr. McKissick, "and thank God for them."

But he went on to complain that he was spending much of his time "holding hands" with white financial supporters who had grown disenchanted because of what they believed was rising anger and racism among Negroes.

Other civil rights organizations are also experiencing declining white financial contributions and feel a common bond in trying to create a new financial base among Negroes.

Mr. McKissick said, however, that no matter how angry the Negro might sometimes sound, the civil rights movement was not becoming "Black Nationalist" but simply developing a sense of racial pride.

Stokely Carmichael, the new chairman of the Student Committee, is also sensitive about the charge of racism and Black Nationalism.

"I'm for the Negro," he says, "I'm not anti anything."

But he has yet to convince liberals, whose disenchantment with the movement increased last month when the Student Committee announced it would no longer participate in the White House Conference on Civil Rights and would step up its campaign to seize power in areas where Negroes outnumbered whites.

Other civil rights organizations think that the decision on the White House Conference was a mistake on the part of the Student Committee, but they have less quarrel with the committee's appeal for Negro political power.

The Congress of Racial Equality and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference are urging their followers to win a majority voice in Government when they can, but they prefer to put it more subtly than the Student Committee and they shun the use of the word "power."

The rights activists are walking a thin line, one that might conceivably cause the white North to disengage itself from the rights struggle in the South as it did in the waning decades of the last century. But they are saying in Mississippi that they see no other way to activate Negroes and make them develop a sense of "somebodyness."

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference is aware of the dangers of following this course, and it is trying to reassure the nation's liberals that it will not let the thrust of the movement carry it too far.

Last night at a church in Batesville, the Rev. Ralph Abernathy, one of Dr. King's top aides, mounted the podium in a Negro church and said:

"If you got any notions that Negroes can solve our problems by ourselves, you got another thought coming. We welcome white people."

Then he paused and said:

"Ain't that right?"

"That's right," the audience shouted.

Local Marches for Rights Are Urged

By PAUL HOFMANN

A new liberal-radical alliance called yesterday for local marches throughout the nation to support the Mississippi civil rights march and Negro voter registration.

The National Conference for New Politics said in a motion adopted at the first meeting of its executive committee here that the marchers should "demand full Federal protection for Negroes registering to vote in Mississippi and full Federal provision of mobile registrars in every county" of that state.

The marches should be organized locally in close relation with "voter registration work in the North and West," the motion suggested.

Two Southern civil rights leaders participated in the meeting of the 18-member executive committee, which was held at the New York Friends Group Peace Information Center, a Quaker unit, in a brownstone building, 218 East 18th Street. They were Victoria Gray, a militant in the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party, and Julian Bond, a co-chairman of the new alliance who arrived from Georgia shortly after noon.

Mr. Bond has been elected to the Georgia Legislature but denied his seat because of his opposition to the war in Vietnam. The other alliance co-chairman is Simon Casady, former president of the California Democratic Council, a Democratic party liberal organization, and also an outspoken critic of the Administration's Vietnam policy.

Mr. Casady said in an intermission at yesterday's meeting that the committee had started evaluating primary contests in New York, Mississippi, Ohio, California and Oregon to select candidates it would back.

The conference was formed to support candidates in this year's elections who advocate "new politics" to end the war in Vietnam and spur civil rights and antipoverty programs. The conference includes liberals and radical activists.

Originally conceived as a service organization to provide the "new politics" candidates with funds and manpower for their campaigns, the conference appeared yesterday to move toward a permanent coalition of antiwar and civil rights groups. Paul Booth, national secretary of the left-wing Students for a Democratic Society and a member of the conference's executive committee, said that "the potential exists" for such a coalition.

Dr. Benjamin Spock, the pediatrician who also is a committee member, remarked that there was "considerable parallel" between the conference's interests and those of Senator Robert F. Kennedy. Mr. Booth broke in to say he wasn't so sure about this.

Mr. Casady said that "old liberals," the new radical campus generation, antipoverty and civil rights groups and such still amorphous labor movements as those of farm workers could cooperate for "new politics." He said that "the upper echelon of organized labor is beginning to take on the same coloration of the establishmen."

The establishment, in left-wing parlance, is the dominant power structure as opposed to movements for political and social change. Antiwar groups complain about lack of support from labor unions.

Discussing the chances for antiwar and civil rights movements to merge, Mrs. Gray expressed confidence, citing support that her party, which champions the rights of Mississippi Negroes, was receiving from whites.

28% of Nonwhite Children Have One Parent in Home

Twenty-eight per cent of the nonwhite children living in families in New York City are in homes with only one parent, according to a report to be issued tomorrow by the Community Council of Greater New York. The report says that 8 per cent of the white children are in similar homes.

The study, "Families in New York City: Social and Economic Characteristics," was written by Miriam P. Suckow and Florence E. Cuttrell, who based their findings on census data.

Other highlights of the report show that median income of the city's more than two million families rose from $3,526 in 1949 to $6,091 in 1959. This represents a 43 per cent increase in purchasing power, after allowances for higher price levels.

The report notes, however, that 15 per cent of the city's families had annual incomes under $3,000. Twenty-seven per cent of nonwhite families fell in this category.

Bonanza Lists Record Traffic

Bonanza Air Lines reported record traffic during May on its routes serving California, Nevada, Utah and Arizona. The line's DC-9 jets carried 72,354 passengers last month. May boardings were up 28 per cent over last year, and 2 per cent over April, 1966.

'Black Power' Plea Decried by Dr. King

MOVEMENT

By United Press International

ATLANTA, June 20 — The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. appealed today for an end to talk of "black power" among some Negro leaders.

"It is absolutely necessary for the Negro to gain power, but the term 'black power' is unfortunate because it tends to give the impression of black nationalism," Dr. King said in an interview shortly before he rejoined the freedom march in Mississippi.

The head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference made his statement the day after Negroes taking part in the march had chanted "black power, black power" as they entered the town of Belzoni, Miss.

It also came a day after Stokely Carmichael, newly elected head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and James H. Meredith, whose shooting turned the Mississippi march into a mass effort, both told national television audiences that nonviolence did not go far enough to solve racial problems.

"We must never seek power exclusively for the Negro but the sharing of power with the white people," Dr. King said.

"Any other course is exchanging one form of tyranny for another," he added. "Black supremacy would be equally as evil as white supremacy."

Dr. King, who helped get the mass Mississippi march started after the wounding of Mr. Meredith, spoke of "grave consequences" should his own nonviolent approach to the civil rights program be discarded.

He emphasized that he did not want to increase speculation that there had been a major rift among the civil rights organizations over tactics and strategy. He insisted that the major responsible Negro leaders—and the Negro masses—were committed to a peaceful solution to the Negro's problems.

The implication was clear however, that Dr. King was seriously disturbed by the growing militancy of some racial groups, including the Mississippi marchers, and the fighting words of some of the new breed of Negro leaders.

Dr. King saw in Mr. Carmichael's militant approach a danger of spreading unrest in such tension spots as the Watts district of Los Angeles and in Chicago, where Dr. King now has a major civil rights campaign in full swing.

Mr. Carmichael's call for "power for the black man" was quickly echoed on the Mississippi marching line with a yell for "white man's blood."

Such talk, Dr. King said, simply stirs the hatred of equally militant whites without solving any of the basic problems.

"I see no significant trend in the country toward black nationalism," Dr. King said. "The civil rights movement is generally strongly opposed to this philosophy. It is really a very small segment that turns to such measures."

Dr. King insisted that Negroes "have made their greatest strides" through adherence to nonviolence.

DR. KING DISPUTED ON 'BLACK POWER'

MOVEMENT

He Misunderstands Aims of Negro, CORE Aide Says

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

The associate director of the Congress of Racial Equality said yesterday that the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. "shows a basic misunderstanding of what the Negro on the farm and on the streets is really asking for."

The official, Lincoln Lynch, was referring to Dr. King's rejection on Monday of the call by some Negro leaders for "black power." Dr. King had said that the Negro must seek to "share" power with whites.

"This power, economic, political and psychological has been denied the black man for too long and it must be realized," Mr. Lynch said. "We need black people standing on their own two feet and all the shouts of 'freedom now' are meaningless and empty phrases until we accomplish this."

Mr. Lynch said in a telephone interview that the greatest need of the Negro was that he be convinced that he can achieve all the changes necessary in this nation himself.

"The white man will not respect you until you can stand toe to toe with him and eyeball to eyeball," the second highest official of CORE said.

"History has shown that if you're really depending on the vast majority of whites to help you're really leaning on a very broken reed," he added.

Mr. Lynch insisted that he was not voicing black nationalist themes but facing "realities." He said that many whites joining the movement liked to think of themselves as "saviors of the Negro people when they should think of themselves as partners in the struggle."

The popularity of the "black power" theme in recent days, and especially on the current civil rights march through Mississippi, comes because "Negroes, old and young alike, now realize that the ways of Booker T. Washington and other moderates have not worked," Mr. Lynch said.

The CORE official said this issue of black power would probably force an even wider breach between the more moderate positions taken by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the National Urban League and Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the position of the more militant groups, including CORE and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"As time goes by the militants will appear more militant and the moderates more moderate," he said. "But what we must remember is that no man can be 'moderately' free."

Dr. King had said that any course, other than sharing power with whites, would be just another form of tyranny, and he added:

"Black supremacy would be equally as evil as white supremacy."

Stokeley Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and a leader in the "black power" advocates, has maintained that it is impossible for Negroes to work within the Democratic and Republican parties. Asking Negroes to join either party, Mr. Carmichael said recently, was like "asking Jews to join the Nazi party."

A citywide police phone number is available for emergency calls. It is 440-1234. The Police Department requests that emergency callers be brief, explicit and calm. All nonemergency calls and routine business calls should be placed through local administrative police numbers.

End Trek in Mississippi Under Heavy Protection

MOVEMENT

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., June 26—A wave of 12,000 to 15,000 civil rights advocates, most of them Mississippi Negroes, pressed around the State Capitol today as the long civil rights march through Mississippi ended.

Civil rights leaders, shouting their pleasure at the size of the crowd, said the demonstration ranked as the third largest march in civil rights history, behind the march on Washington in 1964 and the march from Selma to Montgomery in Alabama in 1965.

Hundreds of state highway patrolmen, National Guard men and sheriff's deputies guarded the last eight-mile leg of the march. There was tension but no violence.

A white man shoved Justice Michael A. Musmano of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court from his lawn and then dashed into his house as more than 100 Negroes surged toward him.

Three houses away, a white man stood by a no-trespassing sign with a brick in his hand, but two of the 11 Negroes on the Jackson police force quickly stepped between him and the marchers.

An Illinois Central railroad engine moved toward the marchers as they stepped over a crossing. While the engine was still moving, Robert Green of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and 10 others rushed in front of it, mounted its cow catcher and shouted, "Stop, stop."

The engine ground to a halt within 10 to 15 feet of the marching column.

James H. Meredith, who started the march from the lobby of the Peabody Hotel in Memphis on June 5 and saw it grow after he was shot a day later, complained about his leg wounds and hiked only briefly.

"It's everybody," Mr. Meredith said from a car at the head of the march column as it neared the Capitol. "You can't do any better than that."

The march was led in his stead by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Floyd B. McKissick, director of the Congress of Racial Equality; Stokely Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Walter Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers Union, and Whitney Young, director of the National League.

Missing from the marching column was Charles Evers, Mississippi field director for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and other leaders of the N.A.A.C.P.

They were banned from the Capitol rally program during a strategy session of march leaders that started late last night and continued into this morning.

The reason the march leaders gave for the exclusion was that Mr. Evers had repudiated the "march manifesto" during the first week of the march. He said then that it was "too critical" of President Johnson and that he feared many of the marchers would "leave with the cameramen" when the march was over and leave Negro Mississippians "holding the bag."

However, Mr. Evers joined the marching column two weeks ago and said he was convinced the march was benefiting Mississippi Negroes by encouraging voter registration.

"Charles Evers is a good man," Floyd B. McKissick, national director of CORE, said, He said Mr. Evers had been prevented from signing the march manifesto by the N.A.A.C.P. national office.

Rally Platform Limited

The Congress of Racial Equality, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party voted to limit the rally platform to leaders of organizations that had signed the manifesto.

Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Medical Committee for Human Rights voted against the proposal.

Whitney Young, director of the National Urban League, was allowed on the platform after he had agreed to sign the manifesto. The manifesto demands that President Johnson send Federal voting examiners into 600 Southern counties, make sweeping changes in his pending civil rights bill and start a massive aid program for Negroes.

Organizational rivalries repeatedly flared in today's march on the Capitol. The Student Committee passed out placards that said "Move on Over or We'll Move on Over YOU" and depicted a lunging black panther, the symbol of the committee's independent Negro political movement.

CORE passed out posters saying "Freedom Now," and the Leadership Conference distributed hundreds of plastic United States flags.

The sight of the waving flags sent Willie Ricks, a field secretary for the Student Committee, rushing into the march column. "Give me those flags," he said. "That flag does not represent you."

The Rev. John Morris, director of the Episcopal Society of Cultural and Racial Unity, rushed over to Mr. Ricks and urged him to leave the flags alone.

Supporters of the Student Committee repeatedly roared the organization's new chant, "Black power, black power." Supporters of the Leadership Conference tried to drown out the chant by yelling, Freedom,

Mr. Meredith made it clear that he supported "Black power."

A Student Committee partisan yelled the chant, and James Orange, a field secretary for the Leadership Conference, bellowed "Freedom" in response.

"Shut up," Mr. Meredith said with a wave of his swagger stick at Mr. Orange.

"You mean you can say 'Black power,' but we can't say 'Freedom?'" Mr. Orange asked.

Mr. Meredith stared ahead.

It was the wounding of Mr. Meredith on his pilgrimage into Mississippi to encourage voter registration that sent civil rights leaders hurrying from throughout the nation to the ambush scene to pick up the march.

During most of the circuitous 260-mile hike into Jackson, the marching column ranged from 150 to 300 persons. It occasionally dropped to as few as 34 persons as marchers fanned out to encourage voter registration, and it climbed to as many as 3,500 as it passed through towns and cities.

Some 2,000 persons left the Tougaloo College campus today for the last lag of the march and picked up recruits along the way. Within an hour, the colunm had grown to more than 3,000 and it continued to swell.

Mrs. Molly Gray, a 61-year-old Negro domestic, placed chairs under her mimosa tree and served water to more than 20 Negroes who were waiting on her lawn to join the march.

As she sat under her tree, a truckload of Student Committee workers passed shouting "Black power."

Mrs. Gray chuckled and yelled "Black power."

Mrs. Lilliemae Poats shielded her four children from the sun with a purple parasol as they waited to "march for our freedom."

Near the end of the march, Mr. Green of the Leadership Conference charged that a city policeman had threatened to shoot him. He said that he had received permission from police officials to drive a truck alongside the line of march to pick up tired marchers.

He said the policeman had stopped him, jumped on the hood of the truck, aimed his pistol at Mr. Green's head and said, "Get that God damned truck out of here, nigger, or I'll blow your God damned hea off."

A crowd of whites standing nearby yelled, "Shoot him shoot him," Mr. Green said.

He drove the truck away.

Most whites simply stared silently as the march passed, and a handful grinned and waved at the marchers. Some had Confederate flags, and one had a sign saying, "Go Home."

THE

Snag on Literacy Drive Worries Ex-CORE Chief

By M S. HANDLER

James Farmer said yesterday that he wondered whether he made the right decision earlier this year when he resigned as the national director of the Congress of Racial Equality.

Mr. Farmer left CORE in the expectation that the Federal Office of Economic Opportunity would finance his project for a national anti-illiteracy drive under the sponsorship of the Center of Community Action Education.

None of the $860,000 to finance the first year of the anti-illiteracy campaign has arrived, however, although the applications were submitted last Aug. 16.

Mr. Farmer said he had no word from Sargent Shriver, the head of the antipoverty agency, and that members of Mr. Shriver's staff had told him only that there was a controversy about the project in Congress.

While waiting for a decision, Mr. Farmer is earning a livelihood with lectures and consultantships. He said he would wait only a few weeks after the enactment of the antipoverty bills and then decide what to do.

Farmer, 'Twiddling Thumbs,' Awaits U.S. Decision on 10-Month-Old Fund Plea

NYT 6/27/64

"I am currently twiddling my thumbs waiting for the Office of Economic Opportunity to stop twiddling its thumbs," Mr. Farmer said in an interview on the Columbia Broadcasting Company radio program "Let's Find Out."

Asked if he regretted having left CORE, Mr. Farmer replied:

"Well, one wonders sometimes as to whether that was the right decision, inasmuch as the [anti-illiteracy] project has not yet gotten off the ground."

He stressed the urgency of the illiteracy program.

"There are in our country now some 11 or 11½ million people who are functionally illiterate; that is, whose reading and writing skills are below the sixth grade. You can't talk about training a man for a skilled job if the fellow can't read."

On civil rights, Mr. Farmer said that while he opposed violence, "Negroes are no more nonviolent than white people are, in the civil rights movement or outside the civil rights movement."

'Black Power'

Questioned about the slogan "black power" that is being heard in Mississippi and elsewhere in the civil rights struggle, Mr. Farmer, who is still a board member of CORE, replied:

"When you shout the phrase 'black power' before a mass meeting, it sounds terrifying. I think we should not be overly impressed with the rhetoric that is used. We should analyze it."

The road to power, he said is through the ballot box. He said Negroes should vote for any candidates, black or white, who agreed with "our position."

Negroes Wind Up March With Rally in Jackson

JACKSON, Miss. (AP)—Thousands of flag waving Negroes ended the marathon Mississippi civil rights march Sunday with a surprisingly subdued rally behind the heavily guarded state capitol.

The imposing limestone structure was ringed by police and national guardsmen as the march leaders spoke, braced to throw back any attempt to reach the capitol itself. The rally was orderly.

Officers estimated 16,000 Negroes, with a few hundred whites among them, flowed through the streets to pack a portion of the capitol grounds and adjacent areas.

They were led by James H. Meredith, who is a hero figure to Mississippi Negroes, and by a cluster of national civil rights leaders including Dr. Martin Luther King.

All of them spoke, but only Meredith drew a great response from the crowd, which couldn't hear half of what was going on at the flatbed truck which served as the speaker's platform.

"The fear that grips the Negro in America to his very bones" must be erased if civil rights are to be won, cried Meredith.

led about restlessly as the leaders stepped, one by one, to the forest of microphones. Some drifted away before the speeches ended.

In his brief talk, Meredith said the whites of Mississippi are basically decent but "there is a thing in Mississippi that is preventing white people from being decent.

"That thing is white supremacy. The purpose of the march that I started three weeks ago today was to point up and challenge the thing at the base of the system—fear. A fear that grips the Negro in America to his very bones."

Meredith pointed out that he was shot on the second day of his march "but as you can see here, that didn't end a thing."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was ousted from the final program by the other civil rights groups at the last minute on the ground that it did not lend sufficient support to the march.

Chanting "Black Power," a crowd of militant Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee workers moved truculently into the lead as the column, 20 abreast, made the last mile.

No serious incidents were reported along the eight-mile route from Tougaloo College to the Capitol. Temperatures were in the low 90s. City police swarmed along the route.

50 KLANSMEN

The majority of whites watching near the Capitol were impassive. They included 50 sullen Ku Klux Klansmen wearing green pants and shirts, with white ties and white belts.

"We just came down here to make sure these niggers don't cause any trouble," said a leader, who identified the group as Black Knights of the Green Forest. "If they don't, we won't."

There was a brief flurry as the column passed by a downtown building. A white man appeared at a third floor window and a cry of "sniper" went up. However, Negro parade marshals pushed the line back into shape.

CARRY FLAGS

Little American flags fluttered in the hands of the marchers.

Many whites among groups clustered at intersections waved Confederate flags—which have become a segregationist symbol in some areas of the South.

Meredith was wounded by blasts of birdshot fired by a white man who ambushed him near Hernando, Miss., June 6. After recuperating in New York, he rejoined the column Saturday.

"It is as much an honor for every Negro here as it is for me," said Meredith, who rode most of the way in a car at the head of the procession due to a muscle spasm in his wounded leg. "It looks like they all came out."

"I hope there will be no necessity for another march," he added.

Meredith, a controversial figure in Mississippi, started the march on the theory that if he could expose himself without meeting violence, Negroes living in the state would feel it was safe to register as voters.

TOOK A VOTE

The NAACP was barred from the capitol program, the climax of the marathon march, at a vote taken by sponsoring organizations at a meeting at Tougaloo Saturday night.

Voting against the NAACP, a spokesman said, were the SNCC, Congress of Racial Equality, the Delta Ministry and the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party.

Aligned with the NAACP, but outvoted, were the SCLC and the Medical Committee for Human Rights. The Urban League was present but not allowed a vote because it was not a major sponsor.

Though the civil rights leaders all swung in behind Meredith on the final lap, the appearance of unity was deceptive. SNCC leaders have been angrily criticizing the moderate policies of CORE and SCLC.

Rights March Disunity

Campaign in Mississippi Emphasized A New 'Black Consciousness' Force

JACKSON, Miss., June 27—The civil rights march through Mississippi has made it clear that a new philosophy of "black consciousness" is sweeping the civil rights movement. When the march began, the philosophy was only an idea in the mind of Stokely Carmichael and other members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. But when the three - week - old march ended yesterday, the new philosophy had given rise to a distinct movement within a movement. It had Mr. Carmichael as its leader and the late Malcolm X as its prophet. It also had a battle cry, "Black Power," and a slogan directed at whites, "Move on Over, or We'll Move on Over YOU."

News Analysis

Just how many adherents the black consciousness movement has is a matter of heated debate, but there appear to be hundreds in Mississippi, with hundreds more fascinated by it.

Its principal appeal is for Negroes between the ages of 15 and 30, but it also provides an emotional release for older Negroes.

As the rights march drew to an end yesterday a truckload of "black power" advocates passed a 61-year-old Negro domestic sipping ice water under a Mimosa tree.

"Say black power," those in the truck yelled to the woman under the tree.

"Black power," she yelled back and then giggled and shook her glass of ice cubes at the audacity of it all.

For all of its appeal to younger Negroes, however, the movement is potentially the most disruptive force yet in the rights movement. The Rev. Dr. [illegible] tograph Mr. Carmichael as he demonstrates and talks alongside the older civil rights leader. This is an advantage that Malcolm X never had as he exalted the Negro and attacked the "duplicity" and "hypocracy" of the white man.

Should Dr. King decide to step up his attacks on the new philosophy, his task would be difficult because the philosophy almost defies definition. It has been called black nationalism, but that term has been used in the past to describe paramilitary movements, back to Africa movements and "separate Negro state" movements. And none of these is what most Negroes are calling for when they chant "Black power."

The new philosophy has also been called racist and separatist, but the Student Committee, unlike the Black Muslims, are prepared to work with whites, providing the working relationship is built upon terms laid down by Negroes.

Although the movement is amorphous and could grow more strident at any moment, the term "black consciousness" appears to suit it best for the present.

It is an angry movement, designed to shake the Negro into political action by telling him repeatedly that he is as good as the white man, that white society has failed him, that it is demeaning to ask the white man for anything, including school desegregation, and that whatever the Negro wants he should take by drowning "white paternalism" in a sea of black votes.

All this is enough to make the new philosophy an "umbrella "philosophy, broad enough to give shelter to paramilitary organizations such as the

For all of its appeal to younger Negroes, however, the movement is potentially the most disruptive force yet in the rights movement. The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and his aides in the Southern Christian Leadership Conference are alarmed that the "black power" chant might alienate white supporters from the rights drive and make it more difficult to get new legislation through Congress nd financial and moral help from Northern white liberals.

All this has strained an already tenuous working relationship among civil rights organizations, but Dr. King has stopped short of disassociating himself from the Student Committee, a development that would strip him of much of the youthful support he needs to mount successful demonstrations.

Meanwhile, Dr. King is in the position of helping to popularize the black consciousness movement and the "black power" chant.

Reporters and cameramen drawn to a demonstration by the magic of Dr. King's name stayed to write about and photograph Mr. Carmichael as he demonstrates and talks alongside the older civil rights leader. This is an advantage that Malcolm X never had as he exalted the Negro and attacked the "duplicity" and "hypocracy" of the white man.

Should Dr. King decide to step up his attacks on the new philosophy, his task would be difficult because the philosophy almost defies definition. All this is enough to make the new philosophy an "umbrella "philosophy, broad enough to give shelter to paramilitary organizations, such as the Deacons for Defense and Justice and to Negroes, who dislike white people because they are white.

It is also emotional enough to lead Mr. Carmichael, in the heat of a speech, to talk of "tearing down" courthouses, and Willie Ricks, a Student Committee field secretary, to declare that "white blood will flow" if black blood does.

After the speeches are over and the emotionalism is gone, Mr. Ricks and Mr. Carmichael spend hours explaining that they are not antiwhite but are simply trying to make the Negro feel pride in his race.

If white liberals do not understand this, Mr. Carmichael says, then this simply proves that they are not willing to grant the Negro full equality.

But there are Negroes, as well as whites, who fail to follow the Student Committee's dialectic, and thus, the civil rights movement appears to be entering its stormiest period.

Snub of N.A.A.C.P. In Jackson Called 'Petty' by Wilkins

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said yesterday that the exclusion of its representatives from the rally that ended the Mississippi civil rights march in Jackson Sunday was "a petty act."

Mr. Wilkins quoted Charles Evers, the Mississippi N.A.A.C.P. field director, as having said after he had been barred from the platform at the Jackson rally:

"It's all right. I'll be here when they're all gone."

Mr. Wilkins, in the statement released to the press here, said the N.A.A.C.P. would be "steadily at work on civil rights in Mississippi long after the marchers have departed."

March leaders voted to exclude N.A.A.C.P. leaders from the Capitol rally because they said Mr. Evers had repudiated the march "manifesto" by refusing to sign it and saying the marchers would "leave with the cameramen" after the demonstration had ended.

He joined the march after the first week, however.

Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, announced yesterday that the league would establish a branch in Jackson, Miss., to provide services for the city's Negro population.

The Jackson office, he said, will set up job training centers, a counseling service and "a forum for meaningful dialogue between the races."

Mr. Young released the text of a telegram from Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz that said: "Extending our joint efforts into Mississippi is certainly an exciting prospect and I welcome the opportunity to sit down and talk with you about it."

Mr. Young was on the platform in Jackson Sunday night at the civil rights demonstration around the Mississippi State Capitol.

He denied a report in yesterday's edition of The New York Times that he was not allowed on the platform until he had signed a manifesto demanding that President Johnson send Federal voting examiners into 600 Southern counties, make sweeping changes in his pending civil rights bill and start a massive aid program for Negroes.

A spokesman for the league said the league agreed in principal to the manifesto two weeks ago, but had had several reservations about it, including one that it seemed to call for black nationalism.

MOVEMENT

Dr. King's SCLC to Go It Alone in Mississippi Drive

AC 6/29/66

By AL KUETTNER
United Press International

Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) decided Tuesday to "go it alone" in a Mississippi summer campaign because of disagreements with other civil rights organizations.

A major cause of dissension was over payment of the costs of the recent Memphis-to-Jackson "Mississippi freedom march" for James Meredith.

The decision apparently brought to an end long-standing but unsuccessful efforts by civil rights groups to work together. The march itself was plagued with discontent and arguments among leaders almost from the start and Meredith was at times acidly critical of the entire leadership.

The Rev. Andrew Young, executive director of the SCLC, told United Press International that King's organization first agreed to pay most of the expenses and "ended up having to pay practically all of them."

Young estimated the march cost SCLC between $25,000 and $30,000.

He said the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) agreed to "pay a share" of the expenses but "apparently were unable to do so because of a shortage of funds."

It was reported that a rip-roaring argument developed between the civil rights leaders in a long secret meeting after the march wound up in Jackson Sunday. Young declined to discuss details of any such dispute in keeping with standard SCLC policy of soft-pedaling fighting within the ranks.

Young said Hosea Williams, who has become one of King's top "action lieutenants," was designated by SCLC to command the organization's summer program in Mississippi.

Williams is now in Jackson with a staff of about 10 but this group will soon fan out from the state capital, Young said.

Williams was reported "burned up" with other civil rights leaders over disputes that plagued the march most of the way to Jackson.

Young said as a result of disagreements that seemingly could not be repaired "we have decided to conduct our own campaign in Mississippi and let the others run theirs."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a pioneer in Mississippi civil rights work, was virtually boycotted and was not represented at the closing ceremony in Jackson.

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, said Tuesday his organization does not need marches to promote its work.

The National Urban League took only a small part in the Meredith march, which got going strong after Meredith was wounded early in his one-man march to Jackson. King and other leaders worked out the continuation of the march from Meredith's hospital room but, as it turned out, the agreement was a thin one.

Young told a reported that "we ran into all kinds of problems" over direction and leadership of the march.

"We felt we were doing all the work and paying all the bills but somebody else was getting all the credit while handing up all the blame for things that went wrong" Young said.

To Campaign in Mississippi Alone After Disputes

ATLANTA, June 28 (UPI)—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference decided Tuesday to "go it alone" in a Mississippi summer campaign because of disagreements with other civil rights organizations.

A major cause of dissension was over payment of the costs of the recent Memphis-to-Jackson "freedom march" for James H. Meredith.

N. A. A. C. P. Plans Drive

Expansion of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's voter registration campaign in Mississippi was announced here Tuesday by Roy Wilkins, executive director.

Mr. Wilkins expressed confidence that the summer drive would surpass the recent campaign during which 36,800 Negroes were added to voter rolls.

"Our people in that state have demonstrated their ability to carry through with a steady, hard, unspectacular voter registration drive," Mr. Wilkins said.

"They have done this year in and year out without fanfare and without marches or shoving matches with officials and police. Our people supply the work while others contribute philosophy."

The Rev. Allen L. Johnson was appointed to assist Charles Evers, Mississippi field director of the N.A.A.C.P., in the summer registration drive.

Four additional workers will be assigned to each of the state's five Congressional districts. Local volunteers will assist in door-to-door canvassing of unregistered Negroes.

Lewis Quits S.N.C.C.; Shuns 'Black Power'

TITLE MYT

MOVEMENT

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA, June 30—Underscoring a struggle over what direction the civil rights movement takes, an officer and former chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee said today he was quitting the organization.

"It is a bad assumption for any group to say it can make it alone, said John Lewis, 26 years old, who has submitted his resignation effective July 22 after six years with organization, incuding three years as chairman.

"There is a danger in S.N.C.C. of fumbling the ball," Mr. Lewis said in an interview He said he disagreed with the organization's new slogan of "black power," but did not specify that as his reason for resigning.

Mr. Lewis turned in his resignation June 11, one week after the Mississippi civil rights march began. It was in the latter phases of the three-week march that leaders of the group took up the chant of black power.

Disclosure of Mr. Lewis's decision came admidst controversy within the civil rights movement over ideology and tactics: integration and nonviolence versus black power, defined by exponents as Negro control of Negro areas and third-party political efforts.

Stokely Carmichael, 24, elected chairman of the group when Mr. Lewis was unseated May 14, defended black power during and after the march. He said it was neither black supremacist nor antiwhite.

"There is no reason for anyone in this country to get scared of black power," he said after the march ended at Jackson, Miss. "Everybody else has theirs."

Mr. Lewis, who was named chairman of the committee on international affairs in the May elections, said he was concerned over keeping the civil rights movement nonviolent. During the march, there was much talk of retaliatory violence.

"I'm not prepared to give up my personal commitment to nonviolence," said Mr. Lewis. When asked his reasons for leaving he replied:

"I spent almost six years working full time in S.N.C.C., three years as chairman of S.N.C.C. I feel there are other things I could do or would like to do. I will continue to be active in the civil rights movement. I hope to study and do some writing."

He would not elaborate. A student source said, however, that Mr. Lewis had become disillusioned with the organization after the May 14 elections in which he was re-elected and then four hours later was ousted in an all-night session at Nashville.

This source said the fact that Mr. Lewis was on the executive board of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference headed by Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., was used in arguing against Mr. Lewis.

Concerned Over Terminology

Concerned over the new terminology and hoping to unify civil rights forces, Dr. King in an interview called for "a third force—a coalition of the forces f gdwill." He said the term black power was an unfortunate one.

"It gives the impression that we are calling for exclusive power and a kind of black nationalism that does not involve a coalition with whites," he said.

"We must all work unrelentingly for power for the Negro. Part of the dilemma of the Negro is his basic powerlessness. Power is the right to use of strength."

The ideological dispute burst forth into the open in the Mississippi march to Dr. King's surprise. He said the debate over black power and retaliatory violence blunted the march's effectiveness.

John Lewis

But he stopped short of outright repudiation of the student group.

"I still see my role as that of a reconciler," Dr. King said. "I am trying to understand the forces and the psychological atmosphere. I can't spend my time fighting force within the movement."

Dr. King said exponents of black power must "more clearly define the term." He also said also that the Mississippi march gave Mr. Carmichael a platform that he never would have had otherwise.

Kennedy Notes a Peril

WASHINGTON, June 30 (AP)—Senator Robert F. Kennedy says that black power, with its implication that white leadership is not needed, "could be damaging not only to the civil rights movement but to the country."

Mr. Kennedy, who as Attorney General was in charge of civil rights enforcement, deplored the split in Negro leadership he saw manifest in the march begun by James H. Meredith in Mississippi.

He said in an interview that the black power slogan, which has been variously interpreted, could be damaging if it indicated that Negro leaders were spurning white help in their fight for equality.

The New York Democrat credited the march as showing a determination on the part of Negroes to keep up their efforts "until they establish equality."

"But it also indicates a split within the Negro leadership and I think it also demonstrates that there is a militant group of Negroes who are not anxious to work with the white community to try to find answers to these problems," Mr. Kennedy said.

"My judgment for the future of the country is that whites and Negroes must work together. There seems to be a group amongst the Negro leaders who do not think that is necessary and that could be damaging not only to the civil rights movement but to the country."

Public Education Held Still Far From Equal

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 7/2/66

By TOM SEPPY

WASHINGTON (AP) — Public education is largely unequal in most sections of the country despite the 1954 school desegregation decision of the Supreme Court, the U.S. education commissioner reported Friday.

Commissioner Harold Howe II, in a report to President Johnson and Congress, said the inequality is especially marked where Negroes form any significant proportion of the population.

"The great majority of American children attend schools that are largely segregated," the report said. "Among minority groups, Negroes are by far the most segregated."

The report said almost 80 per cent of all white pupils attend schools that are from 90 to 100 per cent white. And at least 97 per cent attend schools that are 50 per cent or more white.

"For Negro pupils, segregation is more nearly complete in the South (as it is for whites also), but it is extensive also in all the other regions where the Negro population is concentrated: the urban North, Midwest, and West," the report said.

"More than 65 per cent of all Negro pupils in the first grade attend schools that are between 90 and 100 per cent Negro. And 87 per cent at grade one, and 66 per cent at grade 12, attend schools that are 50 per cent of more Negro. In the South, most students attend schools that are 100 per cent white or Negro."

The report, entitled "Equality of Educational Opportunity," is based on a survey done by the U.S. Office of Education of 4,000 schools, 605,000 children and 60,000 teachers.

The survey was made under the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which required the education commissioner to conduct a survey and make a report concerning the lack of availability of equal educational opportunities in public educational institutions.

The commissioner released a summary of the report Friday, in advance of a two-year filing deadline Saturday. A complete 400-page report will be issued next month.

The report does not include any recommendations of what policies or programs should be mounted by federal, state or local government agencies to improve educational opportunity in the light of the findings.

Howe told a news briefing on the report, however, "In the months ahead, the U.S. Office of Education will use its own staff and seek the help of advisers to determine how it can use the results of the survey to enhance the educational opportunities for all citizens."

Jury Weighs Civil Rights Case Against 3 Klansmen in Georgia

By BEN A. FRANKLIN

ATHENS, Ga., July 1 — The Federal Government's conspiracy case against three Ku Klux Klansmen went to an all-white jury in the United States District Court here this afternoon.

Two of the defendant, were acquitted in 1964 of the murder of a Negro educator.

In the conspiracy trial lawyers sought to convince the jury that the defendants engaged in a months-long conspiracy in 1964 to "injure, intimidate or oppress" Negroes in the exercise of their rights.

There is no Federal statute prohibiting murder except on Federal property. Murder is a state crime.

However, the Government contended that the alleged conspiracy by the Klansmen reached a climax on July 1, 1964, when Lemuel A. Penn, a Negro educator from Washington, D.C., was slain.

Mr. Penn, who was passing through Georgia in an automobile, was killed by night-riders who overtook his car on a lonely road 20 miles from here and fired two shotgun blasts into it from their speeding station wagon.

Was Returning From Camp

Mr. Penn, 49 years old, was an assistant superintendent of education in the District of Columbia public school system and a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve. He was returning home from a tour of active duty at Fort Benning, Ga.

The fact that Cecil William Myers and Joseph Howard Sims, two of the three defendants in the conspiracy trial, were acquited of murdering Mr. Penn was the unspoken—or nearly unspoken—reason for the Federal prosecution under a little-used Reconstruction era civil rights statute.

Mr. Myers, Mr. Sims and George Hampton Turner, the third defendant, were indicted by a Federal grand jury under Section 241 of Title 18 of the United States Code. The statute, passed in 1870, makes it a felony, punishable by up to 10 years in prison, to conspire to intimidate any person in the exercise of his civil rights.

The United States Supreme Court last March interpreted the law of 1870 to include interference with free interstate travel.

Defense Argument

William J. Hudson, the Klansmen's lawyer, told the jury in a final argument this morning that "these boys are not being tried for murder."

"They did not kill Mr. Penn," he declared.

As for an incident on July 4, 1964, in which Mr. Sims was said to have told two other out-of-state Negro motorists to get "back to New Jersey where you came from," Mr. Hudson said:

"You could look at that in one way as inviting these people to travel in interstate commerce."

United States Attorney Floyd M. Buford declared this afternoon that "we've got two men on trial here that participated in that killing." Holding an outstretched finger only a few inches from Mr. Myers and Mr. Sims, Mr. Buford shouted that they were "cowards who hid behind masks."

Judge William A. Bootle instructed the ten men and two women jurors, all but one of them from rural Georgia communities, that the Government was not required to show, in order to prove its case, that any of the defendants killed or intended to kill Mr. Penn.

It was only necessary for the Government to have shown that the defendants intended to intimidate "a class of persons," the judge declared, for the jury to find them guilty. He added that free interstate travel "is a basic right under the Constitution."

CORE CHIEFS CALL FOR SELF-DEFENSE

MOVEMENT

Parley to Get Resolution on Dropping Passive Role

NYT 7/2/66

BALTIMORE, July 1 (UPI) — The Congress of Racial Equality prepared today to abandon nonviolence in its drive for Negro rights.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., a leading advocate of the nonviolent approach, abruptly canceled a scheduled address at CORE's national convention here.

Floyd B. McKissick, CORE national director, told reporters that a move would be made during the four-day convention to adopt a resolution to end passive resistance and nonviolence in the civil rights struggle.

Mr. McKissick said that the resolution, if adopted by the more than 200 delegates representing CORE chapters throughout the nation, would state that Negroes had a right to self-defense and a right to retaliate if subjected to violence.

The possibility of a major change in tactics in his organization's drive for "total equality," Mr. McKissick said, is a result of the failure of state and Federal law enforcement officials to maintain law and order.

An unsuccessful attempt to adopt a similar resolution was made at CORE's convention last year in Durham, N.C.

'Not Unmanly' to Fight

Lincoln O. Lynch, associate national director of Core, declared that "it is unmanly not to retaliate, not to defend your self, your home, your wife and family."

He charged that "nonviolence is another move to dehumanize the Negro man—to take away his last remaining right."

Jackie Hayes, the organization's public relations spokesman, said Dr. King had been scheduled to join Mr. McKissick on the platform for a convention address on Sunday. Mr. Hayes said that in checking with Dr. King's office to confirm the speaking engagement he had been told that when Dr. King committed himself to address the convention, he had forgotten that he was to address his own church congregation in Atlanta on that date.

The convention is being held in the Knox Presbyterian Church in a predominantly Negro slum section of this city.

Lynch Defines Goal

BALTIMORE, July 1 (AP) — Mr. Lynch, declared today:

"CORE will not initiate — and I emphasize that — any form of violence, but when one is attacked, he should defend himself and the convention will have to speak out on it."

Carmichael Scores Rights Bill; Newsmen Walk Out at Interview

MOVEMENT 7/2/66

WASHINGTON, July 1 (AP) — Stokely Carmichael, the chairman of the Student nonviolent Coordinating Committee, said today the Administration's civil rights bill was "a sham" and saw newsmen walk out on him when he refused to comment on leadership changes within the rights movement.

"The bill is totally useless and unnecessary," he told a news conference called by the student committee's Washington unit. "President Johnson is trying to take himself off the spot again."

Ntwsmen, who had turned out in large numbers for the conference, then tried to question Mr. Carmichael about "Black Power," the group's new slogan, and about the resignation from the committee yesterday of John R. Lewis, who was ousted as chairman last May 14.

Mr. Carmichael and Mrs. Claire Hancock, a member of the Washington unit, declared the questions out of bounds.

"The press will not decide what our press conferences are to be," Mr. Carmichael said.

Mrs. Hancock said the announcement for the session said it would be about civil rights legislation.

When further questions also were turned aside, most of the newsmen attending the conference at the Mount Bethel Baptist Church in a Negro section of the city walked out.

In calling the civil rights bill a sham, Mr. Carmichael said the Attorney General already had the power to file lawsuits to get Negroes represented on Southern juries and that President Johnson could ban 80 per cent of housing segregation by signing an Executive order.

KLAN ASKS NEW YORK TO POLICE ITS MARCH

WASHINGTON, July 1 (UPI) —A leader of the Maryland Ku Klux Klan asked Governor Rockefeller of New York yesterday to guarantee protection to Klansmen for a planned march through Harlem on Aug. 1.

Zavier Edwards of Savage, Md., Grand Dragon of the Interstate Klan Knights of the KKK, asked in a telegram to Mr. Rockefeller that the Governor "repeal a certain unconstitutional law and give proper protection at the same time for us." Edwards said:

"We know about your anti-Klan law but feel that since you welcome the un-American Communist party and such hate groups as the black nationalists you can surely do something toward our 100 per cent American cause."

An aide to Mr. Rockefeller said yesterday that Mr. Edwards's telegram had been sent to the New York City Police Department on the ground that the Governor's office had no jurisdiction.

Police headquarters said that the telegram had not been received, and that the Ku Klux Klan had not applied for a permit to march.

No march can be held without a permit, it was explained.

Burglar Does Thorough Job

ST. JOSEPH, Mo. (AP)—St. Joseph has a burglar who is thorough in his work. When he broke into the George Hoyt filling station, he not only took a number of motor car supplies, pumped 17 gallons of gasoline into his car, took an electric clock, a radio, an electric razor and some cigars—he scooped up all the empty soda pop bottles and took them with him.

Litter Figures Given

The Good Outdoor Manners Association is quoted by United Press International as reporting that if a piece of paper weighing only one ounce drops daily from every car on the road, it would make 910,000 tons of trash in one year.

CORE Leaning to Retaliation

MOVEMENT

AE 7/2/64

BALTIMORE, Md. (UPI) — The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) prepared Friday to abandon non - violence in its drive for Negro rights. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., leading advocate of the non-violent approach, abruptly cancelled a scheduled address at CORE's national convention here.

CORE national director Floyd B. McKissick advised newsmen Friday that a move would be made during the four-day convention to gain passage of a resolution to deal a death blow to the technique of passive resistance and non-violence in the civil rights struggle.

McKissick said the resolution, if it is approved by the more than 200 delegates representing CORE chapters throughout the country, would state that Negroes have a right to self-defense and a right to retaliate if subjected to violence.

Lincoln O. Lynch, associate national director of CORE, declared "it is unmanly not to retaliate, not to defend yourself, your home, your wife and family."

Jackie Hayes, CORE public relations spokesman, said Dr. King had been scheduled to join McKissick on the platform for a convention address on Sunday. Tayes said that in checking with King's office to confirm the speaking engagement he had been told that when Dr. King committed himself to address the convention, he had forgotten that he was to address his own church congregation in Atlanta on that date.

Black Nationalists Gain More Attention in Harlem

MOVEMENT NYT 7/3/66

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

The men came in long, plowing robes and sandals and some carried lion's tails that they whisked in the hot, Sunday afternoon air. The women wore multicolored, sarong types of sheaths and some carried small children on their backs.

"Alafia?" they greeted one another, asking in Yoruba if each had peace and health.

"Alafia ni adupe," came the frequent reply to say, in the West African language, that they were fine.

It looked much like an African village, but it was the plateau atop the large hill in Harlem's Mount Morris Park. The Negroes there, who prefer to be called African-Americans, had come weekly during the spring to take part in the "Harlem People's Parliament," and affiliation of the Yoruba Temple, to promote "Ujamaa" or "African socialism."

"Ujamaa is the only solution for the black man," the parliament "prime minister," Baba Adefumi, told his followers, "Ujamaa," he explained, "means common ownership of Harlem resources for the good of Harlem residents." The parliament now meets in more secret sessions at the temple at 28 West 116 Street, so that they can work out a detailed program with only their membership present.

The Yoruba Temple is one of the most active of more than two score black nationalist groups that function openly in Harlem.

Loosely applied to a variety of pro-African and Afro-Americans, as well as antiwhite schools of thought, the term black nationalist is one of the most frequently confused concepts coming out of the Negro ghettos.

The black nationalist label has been misapplied by some in recent weeks to Negro militants on the Mississippi march who called for "black power." What is now being stressed as black power has long been one of the underlying themes of the militant civil rightists' preachings. It seeks a basically integrated community where Negroes have a voice commensurate with their numbers and where Negroes, not white people, lead toward that goal.

So caught up with the do-it-yourself attitude of their violently pro-Negro concept, the adherents of black power are often accused of antiwhite pronouncements and some observers say they seem even to loose sight of their goal of integration.

But the man who first used the phrase, Stokely Carmichael, insists that black power supporters are neither antiwhite nor black supremists. "Every other group has power in this country," Mr. Carmichael said recently. "Why shouldn't the Negro?"

The black nationalist, however, has long given up on the white man; he is convinced that integration will not work and seeks a complete racial separation. Some black nationalists preach black supremacy.

Young black nationalists

have, in recent weeks, provided some of the leadership that resulted in the controveries, violence and arrest of five persons at Harlem's Public School 175 last week. Nationalist elements supported school boycotts there and advocated more Negro teachers in Harlem, control of school policies by parents in the area, and a tress on African history studies.

"We have black counterparts to Charlemagne and Queen Mary," one black nationalist leader said recently.

The over-all black nationalist community is thought to be a very small part of the total Negro population, but close observers feel it is having a small but steady growth. Said a civil rights organizer: "Everytime we fail to deliver something positive to that man in the street you can look for another convert to black nationalism."

Most black nationalist groups are reluctant to discuss their numbers, some tend to give highly inflated figures, and still others concede they represent "paper organizations" and carry their groups "in my pocket." Estimates of the number of black nationalists in New York City, with varying degrees of acitivity and commitment, have been given by several sources as ranging from 1,000 to 10,000.

Although black nationalists as a group have been lumped with those Negroes who would mount a war against white people, there seem to be very few black nationalists who could be called violence-prone extremists. No black nationalists support the nonviolent approach normally associated with the civil rights movement, however, and they have historically advocated Negro self-defense.

Generally speaking, the black nationalist represents an angry, amorphous and fragmented community that, by choice, is out of both the American and the American Negro mainstreams.

Pride in Being Black

Themes common to the majority of black nationalists are far fewer than those that keep the several groups apart and they include: a fierce pride in being black; support for Negro enterprise; the belief that racial integration will not work; the idea that Negroes should own their own communities and the feeling that Negroes who are not yet committed to black nationalism will "soon see the light."

While these attributes are also common to the Black Muslim followers of Elijah Muhammad, the Black Muslim is primarily a religious man, while black nationalists are not necessarily religious.

The confusion about the black nationalists is not totally the fault of those on the outside looking in, for the groups accepting this general classification express many differences in their own goals and philosophies. This fragmentation is quite clear in New York City, where some black nationalists advocate going back to Africa, others want a separate nation within the United States, and still others want Harlem as a city unto itself.

Some wear only African garb and study African languages. Some say they hate whites, while others tolerate whites in business or impersonal dealings, and still others are married to whites or have white girl friends. Many black nationalists are former Black Muslims who either came to disagree with the stern discipline or teachings, or backslid from the group.

"The nationalist is nothing but a con man," said one Harlem resident who listened recently to speakers at the traditional black nationalist gathering point, 7th Avenue and 125th Street. "He's just after the dollar like the preacher and everybody else."

The participation of black nationalists, as a group, in the Harlem riots of July, 1964, is also a source of conflict. Some were observed urging youths to join in the battles against the police, while others talked against rioting.

United Press International

Stokely Carmichael, who is leader of Student Nonviolent Coordinating Council.

James Farmer, then the executive director of the Congress of Racial Equality, was unsuccessful in persuading black nationalists to use their influence in stopping the riots during a clandestine meeting two years ago. On the other hand, some other known black nationalists joined Mr. Farmer in the streets in urging youths to quit the fighting and go home. Black nationalists were among the leaders who formed the United Council of Harlem Organizations that sought to end the rioting.

In addition, there is a preponderence of black nationalists, or Afrophiles, among those who seek to import into Harlem a culture based mainly on the music, art and styles of the African continent.

Identification With Africa

At the same time there are many Negroes who identify themselves strongly with Africa and support the growing black consciousness here, but who object to being labeled black nationalist. "What's the difference," asked a pro-African and non-nationalist businessman in Harlem, "between a Negro identifying with Africa and whites joining St. Patrick's Day, Columbus Day and Pulaski Day parades?"

The African identity trend is especially notable among young Negroes in large, urban centers, with the popularity of "Afro" or natural hair styles; the growth of interest in the study of African history, music and dance and the general acceptance (often a preference) for the substitution of the term black or Afro-American for Negro.

A well-to-do Negro suburban housewife, whose strictly race-related activities normally extend no further than supporting an annual dance by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, recently shocked white friends by declaring that her national hero had been Malcolm X, because of his interest in Africa. Internationally, she liked Jomo Kenyatta, the former Mau Mau leader who now heads the East African nation of Kenya.

A highly successful Negro musician who is an Afrophile, sees this interest among young people as "very positive, "but he says he hopes" it makes them push harder for their share of America."

Discussing the formal black nationalist community, however, Dr. Kenneth Clark, the psychologist, wrote in his book, "Dark Ghetto": "They recruit most successfully from the lower socio-economic and marginal classes."

Dr. Clark, who is a Negro, wrote that the black nationalist philosophy is "rooted in hatred and despair" and reflects "the American racist simplifications of the importance of skin color."

"The dramatic twist which these groups give to American racism," he went on, "is that they preach the supremacy of blacks and the inherent degradation of whites. This reversal is dramatic, disturbing, and terrifying to whites and to some middle and upper-class Negroes as well."

Today's black nationalist groups are for the most part followers of the teachings of the late Marcus Garvey, who stressed the need for economic, cultural and political independence.

Malcolm X's Effect

Malcolm X, who voiced strictly black nationalist sentiments for only about a year, nonetheless had a significant effect on current black nationalist thinking, especially among the younger advocates. (Malcolm X became a black nationalist spokesman in March, 1964, after breaking with the Black Muslims and was killed in February, 1965.)

Malcolm X also served to a great extent to bring black nationalism to nationwide attention after a virtual blackout of information to outsiders when the Garvey era passed. In recent years some black nationalists have found that they are being increasingly heard in Harlem and beyond on a variety of issues, and they have been extremely vocal.

Sketches of some of the black nationalist groups active in Harlem today follow:

YORUBA TEMPLE

Members of this group wear African dress all the time and study the Yoruba language. They are followers of the Orishi Vudu religion, which they say is the same as that practiced in West Africa and Haiti, and called Voodoo. The group, said to number 120 persons, seeks reparations in money and land from the United States for the former slavery of Negroes here. They support the Viet Cong and advocate bringing Negro soldiers home.

THE AFRICAN NATIONALIST PIONEER MOVEMENT

Founded by the late Carlos Cooks 25 years ago, this organization played a leading role in the "buy black" campaigns where Negroes were told not to buy from stores that did not hire Negro workers. Many nationalist-minded young business people in Harlem concede they were influenced to go into the commercial field by Mr. Cooks. Thousands attended Mr. Cooks' funeral held at a Harlem ballroom recently. The organization, said to number 500 persons, is building a two-story headquarters building at 8th Avenue and 141st Street that will be called the Marcus Garvey Memorial Hall.

THE BLACK ARTS

This was formed about a year ago by poet-playwright, LeRoi Jones, as a theatre-school for Harlem youths that would promote racial pride and give instructions in the theatrical and other creative arts. Its biggest push came when it joined the Haryou summer program, Project Uplift, and gave nightly performances throughout Harlem and later in Central Park. While many praised the group, others complained about antiwhite themes in its productions and about some profanity. The police raided the organization's offices earlier this year and said they found several guns and knives. Three former Black Arts members were arrested several weeks ago on charges of attempted bank robbery. The group is apparently not operating at this time and efforts to locate Mr. Jones were not immediately successful.

THE AFRICAN FREEDOM MOVEMENT

This group is led by the husky-voiced street-corner orator, Edward Davis, whose central theme is financial independence for the Negro through business ownership and education. A former laborer, Mr. Davis has numerous contacts with Harlem's grass roots elements and currently works as a community organizer for Haryou. The group is said to number close to 100.

UNITED AFRICAN NATIONALIST MOVEMENT HARLEM COUNCIL FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

James R. Lawson, considered by many to be highly knowledgeable of black nationalists affairs, leads both of these organizations, each said to have about 100 members. Mr. Lawson is a supporter of the need for Negroes to become active in business and in politics. He said black nationalist influence among Negroes was so strong that they could take over any civil rights group at will. Rights spokesmen have denied this. Mr. Lawson works for the Haryou antipoverty program, also, as an adviser on business affairs.

AFRICAN JAZZ-ART SOCIETY & STUDIOS

This is an advertising agency-promotion unit on 125th Street that specializes in productions that have pro-African themes. It is run by the brothers, Cecil, 29 years old, and Ronnie Braithwaite, 28. Cecil is a professional layout man and Ronnie a photographer. They produce several popular extravaganzas annually featuring African clothing and styles, and models who wear no make-up and natural hair styles. The organization advocates the return of Negroes to Africa; has picketed wig shops in Harlem and bars whites from their Harlem-based shows and dances, because their presence might cause a disturbance.

AFRICAN NATIONALISTS OF AMERICA

"Professor" Lewis Michaux leads this back-to-Africa group, said to number about 350, that has its headquarters in the National Memorial African Book Store on Seventh Avenue, near 125th Street. This is a center of black nationalist activity and the site of almost weekly anti-establishment speeches. Mr. Michaux, who is 72 and still quite active, maintains that there must be some good white people in the world, but he adds: "I haven't found any yet."

"Professor" Michaux is a brother of Elder Lightfoot Michaux, known as the Happy Ami Preacher, who for 32 years has conducted religious broadcasts from Washington, D. C. and is president of the Gospel Spreading Association.

The ideological separation of the two brothers shows dramatically how black nationalism can divide members of the same family.

"We came out of the same pea," the "professor" said yesterday, "but we're boiling in different pots. My brother advocates going to heaven. I want to see some of this heaven on earth. And there is heaven with milk and honey here. I just came from a Jewish store and they had milk and they had honey."

The Elder, in an interview yesterday in Virginia said: "I believe in respecting the Government. We have achieved much as we have gone along all these years. We believe that God will righten the wrongs."

AWARENESS

Twenty-six-year-old Akeyele Awolowo runs this commercial art shop on West 123d Street. Mr. Awolowo, who gave up a job as an illustrator for a Madison Avenue firm and changed his name from Maurice Irwin, said he preferred working in an all-black community. He works closely with other black nationalist and Muslim artists, and as a self-styled "minister of propaganda" promotes the concept that all elements of the Harlem community should work together despite their philosophical differences.

ORGANIZATION OF AFRO-AMERICAN UNITY

Mrs. Ella Collins of Boston, half-sister of the late Malcolm X, assumed leadership of the Organization of Afro-American Unity after Malcolm X was killed last year. She has proposed a program of economic development for Negroes that includes the buying of farms for all-black communal living. Some of the members of this group followed Malcolm X out of the Black Muslims, and other came later. Mrs. Collins says the group is nonreligious and nonprofit. The group is said to have about 75 members in New York and about 250 in Boston, where Mrs. Collins lives.

Why the Cry for 'Black Power'

NYT 7/3/66

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Ga., July 2—The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee's "black consciousness" philosophy and its "black power" chant were formally unveiled on the recent civil rights march through Mississippi, but they grew out of six years of cumulative anger on the part of student committee members.

This anger has been given fuel by incident after incident, disappointment after disappointment, in the drive for civil rights. In the minds of the student committee members, the most damning indictment of white society is the fact that there have been more than 30 civil rights killings in the last decade and only three convictions —none for more than 10 years.

All of this lent credence to the rhetoric of Communists, Trotskyites and followers of Malcolm X, the one-time Black Muslim, who have worked with the student committee from time to time since soon after its organization in early 1960.

New Slogan

But in the end the student committee settled on its own "black consciousness" philosophy, one that has Malcolm X as its prophet but its own war cry, "black power," and a new slogan directed at whites: "Move on over, or we'll move on over you."

The black power movement is not "black nationalism" in the sense that the term is normally used. It is not paramilitary or dedicated to all-black states or to the transport of Negroes back to Africa. And, unlike the Black Muslims, it does not exclude whites —providing that they are willing to join on the student committee's terms.

All in all, the philosophy tells Negroes that white society has failed them, that American democracy is a collection of impressive catchwords that command only lip service from the white man, that the Negro is as good if not better than the white man, and that his only salvation lies in seizing political power wherever he possesses the numerical strength to outvote the white man.

Rival Leaders

It is one of the ironies of the civil rights movement that for all of its talk of "black power," the student committee's leaders have been less successful in organizing Negroes than two rival civil rights leaders—Charles Evers, field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Mississippi, whose organization outvoted whites in two Mississippi counties in recent elections; and Dr. Martin Luther King, whose Southern Christian Leadership Conference-backed candidates came close to upsetting white officeholders in almost a dozen counties in Alabama this spring. But Dr. King and Mr. Evers got results by forming a coalition of the dispossessed Negro and the middle-class Negro, and the student committee opposes this as being contrary to the interest of the impoverished Negro.

Perhaps if the "black power" movement ended with talk of black-dominated politics it would merely strip away some liberal white support from the civil rights movement, amounting to just another of the many schisms the civil rights movement has withstood.

But there is something intoxicating about the chant "black power." It leads Stokely Carmichael, the student committee chairman, to talk of tearing down courthouses. And it leads Willie Ricks, an aide to Mr. Carmichael, to mutter that "white blood will flow."

Many student committee members now say that the Negro can prove his manhood only by fighting back at the white man with whatever arms he may possess, and some quietly tell others in the civil rights movement that a riot is the only language the white man understands.

After six years of being the cutting edge of the civil rights movement, of being frightened and jailed more times than they care to remember, many student committee members are now too weary to listen to the argument against their new philosophy—that civil rights murders and nonviolent reaction have led to legislation while riots and retaliation have produced reaction and inaction.

Carmichael Sums Up

Perhaps Mr. Carmichael, who at 24 has been jailed 27 times and has seen friends die in the civil rights cause, summed up the new mood of the student committee best just ten days ago. It was after 2,500 Negroes and white supporters had been routed by tear gas from a public school for Negroes in Canton, Miss., where they had been trying to pitch tents for the civil rights march.

Two student committee members held up Mr. Carmichael, who had been immobilized by tear gas fumes, anger and emotional exhaustion. "I'm so tired, so weary, so tired," Mr. Carmichael said again and again before disappearing with his friends into the darkness.

NEGRO VOTE BLOC PRESSED BY CORE

MOVEMENT

Delegates to Convention See Registration Drive Going On

By M. S. HANDLER

Special to The New York Times

BALTIMORE, July 2 — The Congress of Racial Equality, moving toward a harder line on civil rights, heard members at its 23d annual convention lecture on the importance of Negro block voting to give black communities the majority vote or a determining voice in contested elections.

Delegates were taken out this afternoon on demonstration projects to observe the techniques that are being employed in Baltimore to register Negroes, to force open occupancy, to desegregate bars and restaurants, and to organize workmen into all-Negro unions.

Contest Between Groups

Symptomatic of the change in CORE's direction, most speakers in today's workshops on various aspects of community action no longer used the word "Negro." Instead they used the term "black people" to stimulate the black consciousness that CORE and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee are trying to arouse in Negro communities throughout the nation.

Last night's attacks on the Negro bourgeoisie, the "black preachers who sold out the black people during the Reconstruction Period and are ready to do so today," white liberals and the United States "establishment," also reflected according to experienced observers, the emergence of class conflict within black communities as well as antipathy toward the white middleclass.

The attacks drew thunderous cheers, strengthening the opinion of observers that the civil rights movement had entered a phase of severe competition between big established organizations such as the ational Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Urban League, on one hand, and the smaller but more action-oriented groups, on the other, for the leadership of the nation's Negroes.

Observers also noted after last night's plenary session that the radical reorientation of CORE and the student group was centered on the personality of Stokely Carmichael, the chairman of the student group, who addressed the convention. A group of Negro intellectuals from many parts of the United States gathered in a motel last night and agreed that Mr. Carmichael seemed to possess the personality that might eventually produce in him a black leader of national importance.

Compared to Malcolm

"Stokely," observed a man from Chicago, "has the charisma, the personality fascination, that make him a man who may reach the black masses as did Malcolm X during his later years.

"Stokely is young but the resemblance to Malcolm's power of social analysis, ability to control a crowd, turn it on and off at will, his uncompromising attitude toward the Negro and white middle classes and the United States Government make him a natural."

"The situation today in the United States," said a Washington Negro, is ready-made for Malcolm, and if he were alive today he would set this country on its ear. Stokely may do it. What we have seen today at the convention may well mark a revolution in the civil rights struggle."

The right to self-defense, as expounded by Mr. Carmichael and Floyd B. McKissick, the new national director of CORE, has found almost unanimous acceptance among the delegates to the convention, which is being held in the auditorium of the Knox Presbyterian Church.

CORE officials insist that this attitude toward nonviolence has been distorted by the mass media to mean that the Negroes now favor the use of violence as an instrument of power after long acceptance of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s doctrine of nonviolence.

Mr. McKissick has explained that CORE opposes the initiation of violence by its members. What it believes today, he explained, is that if a Negro, his family, hime or friends are attacked they have the right to defend themselves. Reports that CORE has abandoned its commitment to nonviolence were criticized as wilful misinterpretations.

Calls Doctrine Outdated

Mr. McKissick told reporters this afternoon that the doctrine of nonviolence had outlived its usefulness and could no longer "be sold to the black people."

He contended that "the right of self-defense is a constitutional right and you can't expect black people to surrender that right while whites maintain it—this puts too great a strain on black people."

"If you want a doctrine of nonviolence, you can't have white people who practice violence and expect black people to remain passive," he declared. "Nonviolence is a two-way street. If you want nonviolence then the white people must also practice it."

Press reporting of the civil rights struggle and particularly of the recent march in Mississippi were violently attacked last night by Mr. Carmichael and Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party. Both accused the press of distortion of facts and misinterpretation of events.

Non-Violence Idea Comes Under Fire

BALTIMORE, MD. (UPI)—The Congress of Racial Equality impatient with the civil rights movement's technique of non-violence, prepared Sunday to welcome an advocate of racial separatism to its national convention here.

Minister Lonnie Shabazz, who left a college teaching job at Atlanta University several years to join self-proclaimed prophet Elijah Muhammed's racist religious sect, was to discuss Negro self-identification, a CORE spokesman said.

Shabazz, who holds a Ph. D. degree in mathematics from Cornell University, was scheduled to be one of three speakers at a mass rally Sunday night at the Prince Hall Masonic Lodge in west Baltimore.

James Farmer, former national director of CORE, and Julian Bond, state representative-elect of Georgia who was denied his seat because of his views on the war in Viet Nam, were scheduled to join Shabazz at the rally.

Adopting a controversial theme of "Black Power" at its convention, CORE officials reportedly were busy Sunday preparing resolutions that could change the course of the entire civil rights movement.

Floyd B. McKissick, national director of CORE, earlier in the week said his civil rights group would seek to adopt a resolution calling for an end to non-violence in the struggle for racial equality. He added that "the philosophy of non-violence is dying," and said Negroes must protect themselves when subjected to violence.

By M. S. HANDLER

Special to The New York Times

BALTIMORE, July 3—A proposed literacy drive aimed at reaching millions of Americans appeared doomed today when James Farmer abandoned the proposal and blamed Sargent Shriver for its failure to get off the ground.

Mr. Farmer accused Mr. Shriver, director of the Federal antipoverty agency, of affronting the nation's Negroes by not carrying through with the drive.

Mr. Farmer said the drive had once been unofficially approved by Mr. Shriver's agency, the Office of Economic Opportunity, which was to have provided much of the money for it.

In a telephone interview before coming here to address the 23d annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality, Mr. Farmer said from New York that he had withdrawn the proposal in a telegram to Mr. Shriver today.

Mr. Farmer, who originally submitted the proposed program last Aug. 17, said he had met all the conditions put to him by various Government agencies.

The former national director of CORE said he had told Mr. Shriver in the telegram that the proposed literacy campaign had been widely endorsed but that Mr. Shriver and his associates had nevertheless given him "the silent treatment," failing to reply to his communications.

Such treatment, Mr. Farmer declared in the telegram, was worse than a personal affront to himself. It was, he said, an affront to millions of Americans and a reflection on Mr. Shriver's leadership of the antipoverty program.

Mr. Farmer had reportedly been led to believe that his literacy campaign would receive $860,000 from the Office of Economic Opportunity in the first year of the drive to wipe out functional illiteracy in the United States, which is said to

All the established civil rights groups had endorsed Mr. Farmer's program. And in response to suggestions from various Government agencies, Mr. Farmer had enlarged the board of directors of the proposed organization.

At the convention this afternoon Robert Curvin, regional vice chairman of the Northeastern region of CORE, based in Newark, challenged the "black power" slogan as a policy. He insisted that the convention state specifically what it meant by black power and how black power was to be achieved.

He pleaded with the convention to take into account what the slogan and policy of black power would mean to the white members of CORE, and to weigh the repercussions of any affiliation with the Black Muslims if "black power" required affiliation with the Muslins.

Mr. Curvin declared that it was ridiculous for Negroes to believe that they could go it alone in American society and achieve their objectives without outside support, if that was what the slogan "black power" meant.

Mr. Curvin declared that it was ridiculous for Negroes to believe that they could go it alone in American society and achieve their objectives without outside support, if that was what the slogan "black power" meant.

Political Policy Questioned

Observers at the convention today questioned CORE's ability, in its present condition, to carry out meaningfully its new policy of political action.

The policy is to organize Negro communities into a "third political force" capable of winning elections or of decisively influencing their result.

The present condition of CORE was described by some Negro observers as financially "catastrophic," structurally in disarray, and at the lowest point of efficiency in its history.

While officials of the organization agree that its financial condition is serious, they do not agree that it is catastrophic. They acknowledge that CORE has had to curtail its staff and operations, but they still believe that the new policy can be put into effect.

CORE has closed its regional offices in California and Louisiana due to a lack of money. The national headquarters staff has been substantially reduced. Nevertheless, the leadership, under Floyd B. McKissick, the new national director, plans to initiate a nationwide campaign of "politicizing" the Negro masses.

Officials of CORE say the organization's income began to decline after Congress passed civil rights laws in recent years, thus leading many contributors to conclude that the civil rights struggle was no longer as urgent as in the past.

These officials note that other rights organizations have also suffered a decline in income. But observers say that CORE's income in particular began to shrivel after a CORE leader in Mount Vernon, N.Y., uttered hostile remarks about jews during a biracial meeting.

Jewish liberals, committed to social change, have been among the strongest white supporters of the civil rights movement.

Observers who discern apathy and inefficiency at CORE's headquarters report that because of the decline in income, some staff members have not been paid for as long as six to eight weeks.

Officials of the organization confirm a lag in salary payments but they do not confirm that anyone has gone six to eight weeks without pay.

Revenue Short of Budget

Revenues fell far short of CORE's last year's million dollar budget. While no income figures are available for the last few months, observers maintain that the monthly income rate has fallen sharply below last year's monthly rate.

Accumulated debts for services and goods are estimated between $200,000 and $300,000.

In their reduced financial circumstances, CORE leaders hope that local chapters will finance local projects with the help of "seed money" provided by headquarters. The Baltimore project of organizing Negro labor unions, voter registration, and campaigns for open occupancy and desegregation of bars and restaurants is being locally financed.

Successful CORE field workers, convinced that the new nationwide program of political action can succeed, say CORE was not designed to operate with big staffs direct from national headquarters. They argue that decentralization and local autonomy have been the mainsprings of the organization's past successes.

MOVEMENT

Non-Violence in Rights Is Voted Out by CORE

AC 7/5/66

BALTIMORE (UPI) — The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) Monday unanimously adopted a resolution calling for an end to nonviolence in the civil rights movement.

"We do not find self-defense contradictory to non-violence" CORE's associate national director Lincoln O. Lynch told newsmen outside the Knox Presbyterian Church, where the organization had just concluded its four-day national convention.

The resolution marks a new militancy for the organization, which has embarked on a drive for total racial equality through the acquisition of "black power."

Lynch said the CORE organization also adopted a resolution condemning America's involvement in the war in Viet Nam and calling for a withdrawal of troops from the war effort there.

CORE also adopted a resolution calling for an end to the draft. Lynch said CORE would undertake an educational program "to describe this racist war to the American people."

Commenting on the convention's controversial theme of "black power," Lynch said a resolution was approved explaining what black power is all about. He refused to go into detail, saying a statement would be released later to newsmen.

The deliberations were reported to have been charged with emotion. At one point, one white CORE worker stalked out of the meeting near tears.

Mrs. Marjorie Turanski of the Philadelphia, Pa., CORE chapter, entered a press room adjoining the convention auditorium and immediately became engaged in a discussion with a Negro Mississippi CORE member over the issue of nonviolence.

Mrs. Turanski, who said she spent 14 months in a Nazi concentration camp, told the unidentified Negro that "civil rights workers will be slaughtered" if they take up arms.

Power Struggles And Semantics

A power struggle has begun among the civil rights organizations. Two of them, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and CORE, managed to deny the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People a seat on the platform at the culmination of the Mississippi March in Jackson.

Roy Wilkins, who was a veteran in civil rights activity before most of the SNCC group were born, calmly and correctly described this as a petty act. He said that organization of voters by NAACP will continue.

SNCC leadership presently is committed to an anti-white, anti-U.S. philosophy. This was revealed by the slogans asking for spilling white blood and by the snatching of American flags from Mississippi Negroes who were told, "That flag does not represent you." SNCC had compiled a magnificent record. In the past two years it has lost direction.

Dr. King's group has broken with SNCC and CORE. The announced reason is that they did not pay their share of the costs of the march, but there is no attempt to conceal the fact that CORE and SNCC bear the brunt of criticism for actions harmful to the civil rights movement.

Legal Arm

The NAACP, a legal arm, has been the great rock of the civil rights movement. It will remain so — of necessity, as well as by agreement.

The white toughs of the Mississippi towns that cursed and jeered and threw stones and bottles at paraders played into the hands of the more radical elements as did the man who attemped to kill James Meredith at the outset of his march. Without the philosophy of these cursing, violent white men, there would be no need for marches and demonstrations. Without them SNCC would have to find a legitimate objective rather than take one that is merely anti-white and anti-government.

A Negro teacher in Georgia says, in an honest, frank letter, that for her, and for most Negroes, the phrase "black power" is a matter of semantics. She writes a truthful and courageous letter. The signs, "For Whites Only," "Colored Served in the Rear," "No Negroes Allowed," etc., she correctly says, were slogans of "white power."

Voting Power

"The term 'black power,' in or out of context," she writes, "has meant for the Negro who has suffered the consequences of 'white power,' no less nor more than the determination to obtain power to vote out undesirable city, state and national figures who have been and still are responsible for injustices rendered on the basis of race. It means the determination to insure representation in matters affecting the freedom, economy and citizenship of Negroes 'too.' I do not believe that any person having used the term has meant to even imply that Negroes are seeking power to overthrow the government, but certainly 'power' to share more fully and more effectively in its functions, and to reverse the too long tolerated and too long accepted advertisements of 'white supremacy.'

"The term 'black power,' then," she writes, "can be equated with the term, 'block vote,' in its true interpretation of purpose. So let's take semantics out of the term 'black power,' just as we ignored the purpose which the signs, to which I have referred, so obviously conveyed. 'Power' is in service to mankind and knows no color."

This same teacher writes that Negroes will, of course, notice the semantics of other newspaper and television reports. An example was the use of the phrase "Negro militants" to describe the marchers. But, neither the word militant nor any other adjective was used in reporting the foul - mouth cursing, jeering white men and women who lined the streets of Mississippi and threw rocks, bottles, eggs and other objects at the marchers.

A Change in Negro Course?

MOVEMENT

John Lewis' resignation from SNCC, and Martin Luther King's cancellation of his appearance at the Baltimore convention of CORE, show how rapidly and decisively the civil rights movement is being reconstituted following the ideological debacle of the Mississippi march.

The "black power" zealots now in charge of SNCC and CORE miscalculated badly when they handed over the weapon of nonviolence to Mississippi whites. It was instantly used against them.

Their misjudgment lay in assuming they could taunt and goad Mississippians into violence by their own violently provocative incitements. This was precisely the same miscalculation that whites like Bull Connor and Jim Clark made at Birmingham and Selma. When they failed to provoke the violence they wanted, they were defeated. Public sympathy and national action rewarded the nonviolent.

White Mississippians did foolishly lapse into spasms of force at Philadelphia and Canton during the recent march. Generally, however, Gov. Paul Johnson's leadership was effective in forestalling violence. As in the days when Martin Luther King gave the same kind of leadership to Negroes, victory went to the nonviolent and a harsh public reaction settled against the SNCC and CORE rowdies.

CORE's Baltimore convention, which Dr. King shunned, showed the militants had learned nothing from their Mississippi failure. They moved even further down the road of repudiating nonviolence. Turned around, that means encouragement of violence in practical effect, regardless of any theoretical denial they may wish to make.

Such a policy, if it were to take hold of the American Negro community, would be something far worse than irresponsible. It could be fatal to the cause of civil rights. Heedless leaders who do not seem to care about that are false leaders.

Dr. King, along with other such Negro leaders as Roy Wilkins and Whitney Young, know they can't do business with such betrayers of the Negro revolution. A sharp line is being drawn at last between them.

Out of their contest will come a fateful choice for American Negroes. The ugliness of the Stokely Carmichael-Floyd McKissick power move is ranged against the forces of nonviolence and progress typified by Dr. King and the others. For the good of Negroes as well as the country, Americans had better hope that massive support will swing unhesitantly behind the responsible men and isolate the new radicals at once. They must be opposed as implacably as the violent whites of the Ku Klux Klan have been.

CORE Delegates Adopt Policy of Insisting on 'Black Power'

By M. S. HANDLER
Special to The New York Times

BALTIMORE, July 4—The 23d annual convention of the annual convention of the Con-Congress of Racial Equality adjourned today after making formal its determination to generate "black power" as a new factor in the American political, social and economic system.

In the opinion of observers here, CORE's new orientation, which parallels the line laid down by Stokely Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, opened the possibility of class conflict within the Negro communities throughout the nation.

The resolution implied open opposition to other civil rights organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Urban League and an undeclared war on the civil rights and antipoverty programs of the Johnson Administration.

CORE's rejection of established procedures for achieving full equality for America's 22 million Negroes was flaunted at last night's rally in the Masonic Hall by Floyd McKissick, CORE's new national director, who said:

"The civil rights movement in 1966 has reached the moment of truth. The leaders have not told the people the truth."

Mr. McKissick denounced the Federal Government's antipoverty program as a failure because, he said it had produced only "token gains."

"The black masses have not been elevated by the program," he said. "As long as the white man has all the power and money, nothing will happen because we have nothing. The only way to achieve meaningful change is to take power."

Mrs. McKissick dismissed President Johnson's massive civil rights programs. Referring to the President's rhetoric and performance, he said:

"L.B.J. made a brilliant speech at Howard University—a speech that would make a rattlesnake cry."

Mr. McKissick also referred to President Johnson as the "great white father" to whom the "Toms" always appeal for help.

During the conference, speakers assailed the Negro bourgeoisie, the Negro "Ph.D's," the "black preachers," "the Toms," "the establishment."

At yesterday's plenary session at the Knox Presbyterian Church, Jesse Gray, a guest speaker who tried to organize rent strikes in New York, told cheering delegates that the decisive fight of the Negroes for equality would ultimately be fought in the "back streets and alleys" and that the main effort should be directed toward reaching the submerged black masses. His formula for battle was a united action by all groups that share this approach.

Islam Guards on Stage

Symptomatic of the new approach to "black power" was the appearance at the Masonic hall rally last night of large numbers of uniformed Black Muslims and Muslim "sisters." One of the invited speakers was Lonnie X, the Muslim minister.

About 20 Fruit of Islam guards filed into the auditorium and took up positions at various points in the main hall, the rooms leading to the stage and on stage.

Lonnie X wore the new "Fruit of Islam" uniform, which is deep blue with silver piping on the jacket, red epaulets, silver stripes down the middle of the outer side of the trousers and rimless Muslim-type hats with silver embroidered letters on the hats. The sisters wore long flowing nun-like dresses and veils.

Lonnie X talked of the Negro self-image. He contended that the white man had instilled in the black man deep self-hatred and dislike for all things black by exposing him to the idea from childhood that everything black was inferior and everything worthwhile was white.

Observers at the convention said that the dislike of the Negro bourgeoisie that appear to be spreading among the direct-action groups such as CORE and S.N.N.C. could be attributed to the belief that every time Negroes march in the South and North, get killed or beaten or arrested, the result is that more educated Negroes receive high-paying Federal jobs in the numerous new Federal agencies.

They believe there is a direct correlation, it was said, between the number of Negroes killed and beaten in the South and the number of high-paid jobs distributed to college-trained, middle-class Negroes.

The rejection of the Negro bourgeoisie was accompanied at the CORE convention by a rejection of the white middle-class. Responding to this sentiment, white members refrained as much as possible from participating in open discussions.

Wilkins Defines Term

LOS ANGELES, July 4 (UPI)—Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said today his organization differed with other civil rights groups on the concept of "black power."

He told a news conference on the eve of the start of the N.A.A.C.P.'s 57th annual convention:

"The trouble with 'black power' is it implies 'antiwhite' and we can't have anything to do with it. We are loath to talk about it."

He said the term itself was "a bad choice of words" and explained, "we believe in the legitimate use of power."

"It ought never to be ethnic or racial," he said. "The N.A.A.C.P., for example, has always been a believer in the unfettered ballot for the Negro. We have counseled him on the use of his ballot power for advancement of his race.

"Our whole situation in interracial, not antiracial."

Civil Rights Lawyers Asked to Remain Away From Convention on Coast

LOS ANGELES, July 5—The N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., the principal legal arm of the civil rights movement, was not represented today at the opening of the convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

It was the first time that the fund, which has argued almost all the major civil rights cases in the Supreme Court and the lower Federal courts since the 1954 school desegregation decision, has not been represented at a convention of the N.A.A.C.P.

Although convention sources said that there had been no open break between the two organizations, it was understood that friction had developed as a result of competition for financial aid and a feeling among some members that the legal defense fund should be a Negro.

In past years, it has been customary for the director of the fund, Jack Greenberg, a white lawyer, to hold luncheons and discussion sessions parallel to the functions of the N.A.A.C.P. convention.

This year, however, Mr. Greenberg received a letter from Dr. John A. Morsell, the assistant executive director of the N.A.A.C.P., which, in effect, suggested that he and his associates not attend the convention.

One reason put forward by Dr. Morsell was that the N.A.A.C.P. did not wish to have the activities of the fund divert national attention from the deliberations of the convention.

Today, Dr. Morsell said that the meetings of the fund might also have detracted from tonight's keynote address by Roy Wilkins, executive director of the N.A.A.C.P.

Dr. Morsell asserted that the absence of Mr. Greenberg and his associates did not conceal any ideological or personal difficulties between the N.A.A.C.P. and the fund.

The Fund, an incorporated, separate tax-exempt entity, raised $1.75-million last year to prepare and fight major civil rights legal actions. This year it is seeking to raise $2-million.

It has received financial support from the white community and from foundations, and has been able to enlist some of the best legal minds in the United States to help prepare its briefs.

The N.A.A.C.P. also has a legal section that is becoming progressively more involved in civil rights action. Its cases deal mostly with specific grievances that do not necessarily raise constitutional questions. Last year the legal section of N.A.A.C.P. raised $350,000.

SNCC Sound Truck Assails 'White Jesus' in Vine City

By BILL SHIPP

"What has your white Jesus done for you today?" roars the voice in the sound truck parked on a playground in Atlanta's poverty-stricken Vine City area. "Black Power!" expounds the voice.

The sound truck is operated by the militant black racist Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee. The "white Jesus," referred to by SNCC, is Hector Black, a white self-styled slum fighter who lives with his wife and three children in Vine City.

SNCC wants Black to get out of Vine City. They also want his half-dozen white volunteers to leave. In fact, they don't want any white people working and living in Vine City.

SNCC's cry for Black Power in Vine City, however, is leaving the area more powerless than before. Two major civil rights organizations said Wednesday they have no intention of working in Vine City until the Black Power crowd goes away.

A spokesman for the financially well off Southern Regional Council said SRC would spend no money in the area until "the confusion" is cleared up. Some SRC employes have worked, on their own time, with Black and the Vine City Council, of which he is co-chairman.

Mrs. Florence Robin, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia, said Wednesday that the ACLU planned to conduct civil rights workshops in all Atlanta's slum areas—except Vine City.

"We will not start in Vine City, although the need is great, because we do not wish to exacerbate tensions created by the black power syndrome," Mrs. Robin said.

Black, 41, who was instrumental in getting a $4,700 government anti-poverty grant to work with some Vine City youngsters, refused to say whether he and his white colleagues planned to pull out. But it was reliably reported that Black is considering leaving.

The SNCC sound truck, labeling Black "a white Jesus" and "a fraud," operates almost at his back door.

Black, an honor graduate of Harvard University, was recently summoned to a meeting of the all-Negro Vine City Improvement Association. He was sharply criticized for getting the anti-poverty grant. The association went on record opposing the money going to the Vine City Council.

One prominent Negro leader appeared at the meeting and declared: "That's the American way. The white man puts in an application for a government grant and he gets it. A Negro puts in an application and he get turned down."

A few days later a second meeting of Vine City residents was held. Black got a 65-0 vote of confidence. Bill Ware, director of SNCC's Atlanta Project, addressed the group and labeled both Black and the meeting "a fraud."

Ware, 30, who has operated the soundtruck for SNCC, refused Wednesday to talk about the soundtruck or his Black Power campaign in Vine City.

"Our position is, as it was before, the black people should organize black people and white people should organize white people," Ware said.

WELTNER ANGRY

Meanwhile, Atlanta Rep. Charles Weltner, whose constituency includes the 1,150 families of Vine City, scored SNCC's Black Power move Wednesday.

"It is particularly distressing that at this point in our long and sometimes unhappy history, a small group should come forward with the advocacy of what they call 'Black Power.' The doctrine is nothing more and nothing less than the old outworthy concept of 'white supremacy' with changed colors," Weltner said.

". . . long range progress and real achievement for American Negroes depend upon the good well and sense of community of all Americans. Black Power, at the most, can only appeal to but one tenth of our people . . . It is reckless. And it can only end in failure, bitterness and grief," he added.

Vice President Calls for New Initiatives by the States for Equality

Excerpts from address by Humphrey on Page 22.

By M. S. HANDLER

Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, July 6—Vice President Humphrey denounced black racism tonight.

He aligned the Federal Government with Roy Wilkins and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in their struggle against advocates of "black power."

Mr. Humphrey did not use the term "black power" in his prepared address but this was the message clearly understood by the 1,500 delegates to the 57th annual convention of the N.A.A.C.P. when he said:

"Yes, racism is racism—and there is no room in America for racism of any color. And we must reject calls for racism, whether they come from a throat that is white or one that is black."

Mr. Humphrey said that the N.A.A.C.P. policy of integrating the Negro people into American society must be achieved. He rejected separatism, or apartheid as he called it, as a solution of the Negro problem.

Endorses N.A.A.C.P. Aims

"We must strive," Mr. Humphrey said, "to create a society in which the aims of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the civil rights movement can be achieved."

In his address at a mass rally of the convention at the First Methodist Church, Mr. Humphrey, a long-time member of the organization, confronted the black power issue raised by Stokeley Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and Floyd B. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, at CORE's Baltimore convention last weekend.

Mr. Wilkins, in a speech at the convention last night, bitterly denounced the black power aspirations of S.N.C.C. and CORE as well as the modifications in the policy of nonviolence. He acknowledged that a fundamental divergence had developed in the civil rights camp, which in the past had always agreed on ultimate aims if not always on methods.

Translating black power to mean racism, Mr. Humphrey met the issue in his speech.

"It seems to me fundamental that we cannnot embrace the dogma of the oppressors — the notion that somehow a person's skin determines his worthiness or unworthiness," Mr. Humphrey said.

"Yes, racism is racism — and there's no room in America for racism of any color.

"And we must reject calls for racism, whether they come from a throat that is white or one that is black."

Asserting that "we seek advancement — not apartheid," Mr. Humphrey continued:

"Integration must be recognized as an essential means to the end we are seeking — the ends of freedom, justice and equal opportunity for all Americans."

The Vice President urged that "we must understand there are no easy answers, no instant solutions, to problems generations in the making."

'True Freedom' Cited

"It is one thing to cry 'Freedom now' on the picket lines," he asserted, "but it is another to achieve true freedom in the squalid world of the ghetto.

"It is one thing to demand the Federal Government to meet its growing responsibility in civil rights. But it is another to generate in our states and localities the commitment and urgency required to produce significant improvement in the lives of people."

It was on thing, Mr. Humphrey said, to overcome flagrant examples of racial prejudice, but another to "eliminate the more subtle and sophisticated techniques which effectively restrict true freedom of choice of jobs, education and housing."

Certain problems require priority attention, he went on, as "we strive to translate legal promises of equality and freedom in reality." The Federal Government, he said, accepts its growing responsibilities, which include the pressing for more legislation.

But, he said, "there exists an urgent need for new initiatives and responsibilities in civil rights matters by our states and local governments."

Slum War Stressed

The battle against slums and poverty and for quality education must be waged by local communities with Federal and state assistance, he said. The same initiative by local communities, he added, must be shown in the field of rental and sale of housing.

The Federal Government is prepared to play a major role in this process, Mr. Humphrey said, but the impact of Federal assistance would be greatly magnified if local communities fully committed themselves to these goals.

The old argument of states rights, the Vice President contended, should be replaced with a more meaningful development of states responsibilities, as well [illegible] responsibilities of com[illegible] and individuals.

Excerpts From the Talk by Humphrey

Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, July 6—Following are excerpts from Vice President Humphrey's speech prepared for delivery to the 57th annual convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People here today:

America is marching on the road to freedom.

I am proud to be back among my friends of the N.A.A.C.P. who have led this march for 57 years.

From the shadows of a dark past toward the shining hope of a brighter tomorrow, this march has been difficult, uncertain, and often dangerous. But history shall surely record its glory.

For we marched . . . even when our band was small and our ranks thin and ragged . . . even when victory seemed a distant and unattainable goal.

There have been young marchers and old . . . Negro and white . . . rich and poor . . . but always marching with a common spirit . . . moved by a common hope—and striving for a common objective.

We marched and fought for the end to lynching.

We marched and fought against separate and unequal education, and segregated lunch counters, and a seat in the back of the bus.

There have been defeats, but many victories.

There have been many heroes, and some martyrs.

Yes, the road to freedom is stained with tears and the blood of many Americans—including men such as Medgar Evers — men already counted among authentic American heroes.

We have learned there is no single road to follow . . . no one program. No one slogan that will bring us to the end of our march.

'Many Roles to Play'

There have been many things to do, and many roles to play. And through the years the N.A.A.C.P. has played a role second to none in terms of dedication and determination of sacrifice and courage.

We are here today because of millions of hours spent in the courthouse and on the courthouse steps — sitting down and standing up—in voter registration drives and in the halls of Congress.

Our triumphs have been impressive and numerous. Our progress has been unmistakable. Yet these triumphs and this progress must be judged from the perspective of the man who has borne the burden of oppression and prejudice. A generation ago, it may have been enough for the Negro to ask for the right to enter a restaurant.

But today the Negro American asks:

Is my life better?

Are my children attending better schools?

Do I hold a better job—or any job?

Do I have a voice in the life of my city and my neighborhood?

Am I a first-class citizen—a man among men, in my own eyes and in the eyes of my family?

Until a man can truthfully answer "yes" to these questions, we should not expect him to consider the battle won or the struggle ended.

Broader Base Urged

The time has come to broaden the base of the civil rights movement . . . to reach out into the community and enlist vital new sources of energy and strength.

Here the N. A. A. C. P. has an especially important role to play. You have traditionally sought close cooperation among churches, labor unions, business groups, and service clubs. We must now reach out even further with the message: "Brother, we need you for freedom."

The appeal cuts to the core of those questions of philosophy and of strategy which currently engage the civil rights movement. It seems to me fundamental that we cannot embrace the dogma of the oppressors — the notion that somehow a person's skin color determines his worthiness or unworthiness.

Yes, racism is racism, whether it comes from a throat that is white or one that is black.

Legitimate pride in the achievements and contributions of one's forebears is, of course, another matter. One of the great tragedies of America has been that so few persons—white or black—appreciate the contributions of Negroes to this nation's history.

How many of us, for example, know that 26 of the 44 settlers who established this city of Los Angeles in 1781 were Negroes?

A Basis to Build on

But pride in Negro history and achievement should establish a basis upon which to build a new climate of mutual respect among all elements of society—not false doctrines of racial superiority. We must strive to create a society in which the aims of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the civil rights movement can be achieved. And, always remember, we seek advancement . . . not apartheid.

Negroes have been a part of America since Jamestown. They suffered—and survived—the cruel yoke of slavery. They have experienced hardship and discrimination of a severity and duration that no other group of Americans has known. And the basis for this brutality has been segregation and exclusion—on terms imposed by the white majority.

Today this system is being torn down through the concerted efforts of both whites and Negroes. We must strive to perfect one citizenship, one destiny for all Americans.

Integration must be recognized as an essential means to the ends we are seeking—the ends of freedom, justice and equal opportunity for all Americans.

stability of results achieved." 'cal staffs.

Excerpts From the Speech by Wilkins

MOVEMENT 7/7/66

Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, July 5—Following are excerpts from Roy Wilkins's speech to the 57th annual convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People here Tuesday:

All about us are alarms and confusions as well as great and challenging developments. Differences of opinion are sharper. For the first time since several organizations began to function where only two had functioned before, there emerges what seems to be a difference in goals.

Heretofore there were some differences in methods and emphasis but none in ultimate goals. The end was always to be the inclusion of the American Negro, without racial discrimination, as a full-fledged equal in all phases of American citizenship.

There has now emerged, first a strident and threatening challenge to a strategy widely employed by civil rights groups, namely nonviolence. One organization which has been meeting in Baltimore has passed a resolution declaring for defense of themselves by Negro citizens if they are attacked.

This position is not new as far as the N.A.A.C.P. is concerned. Historically our association has defended in court those persons who have defended themselves and their homes with firearms.

But neither have we couched a policy of manly resistance in such a way that our members and supporters felt compelled to maintain themselves in an armed state, ready to retaliate instantly and in kind whenever attacked.

Sees 'Counterviolence'

We venture the observation that such a publicized posture could serve to stir counter-planning, counteraction and possible conflict. If carried out literally as instant retaliation, in cases adjudged by aggrieved persons to have been grossly unjust, this policy could produce—in extreme situations—lynchings, or, in better-sounding phraseology, private vigilante vengeance.

Moreover, in attempting to substitute for derelict law enforcement machinery, the policy entails the risk of a broader, more indiscriminate crack-down by law officers under the ready-made excuse of restoring law and order.

It seems reasonable to assume that proclaimed protective violence is as likely to encourage counterviolence as it is to discourage violent persecution.

But the more serious division in the civil rights movement is the one posed by a word formulation that implied clearly a difference in goals.

No matter how endlessly they try to explain it, the term "black power" means antiwhite power. In a racially pluralistic society, the concept, the formation and the exercise of that ethnically tagged power means opposition to other ethnic powers. In the black-white relationship, it has to mean that every other ethnic power is the rival and the antagonist of "black power." It has to mean "going it alone." It has to mean separatism.

Now, separatism, whether on the rarefied debate level of "black power" or on the wishful level of a Secessionist Freedom City in Watts, offers a disadvantaged minority little except a chance to shrivel and die.

Ideologically it dictates "up with black and down with white" in precisely the same manner that South Africa reverses that slogan.

It is a reverse Mississippi, a reverse Hitler, a reverse Ku Klux Klan.

If these were evil in our judgment, what virtue can we claim for black over white. If, as some proponents claim, this concept instills pride of race, cannot this pride be taught without preaching hatred or supremacy based on race?

Though it be clarified and clarified again, "black power" in the quick, uncritical and highly emotional adoption it has received from some segments of a beleaguered people can mean in the end only black death. Even if, through some miracle, it should be enthroned briefly, the human spirit, which knows no color or geography or time, would die a little, leaving for wiser and stronger and more compassionate men the painful beating back to the upper trail.

'Father of Hatred'

We of the N.A.A.C.P. will have none of this. We have fought it too long. It is the ranging of race against race on the irrelevant basis of skin color. It is the father of hatred and the mother of violence.

It is the wicked fanaticism which has swelled our tears, broken our bodies, squeezed our hearts and taken the blood of our black and white loved ones. It shall not now poison our forward march.

We seek therefore, as we have sought these many years, for the inclusion of Negro Americans in the nation's life, not their exclusion. This is our land, as much as it is any American's—every square foot of every city and town and village. The task of winning our share is not the easy one of disengagement and flight, but the hard one of work, of short as well as long jumps, of disappointments and of sweet success.

CORE Chief Assails Humphrey For His Attack on Black Power

MOVEMENT

NYT 7/8/66

By ROBERT E. DALLOS

Floyd B. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, charged yesterday that Vice President Humphrey had expressed a "purely racist reaction" to the concept of black power.

He also bitterly denounced the Johnson Administration as being "racist" for not doing enough for the American Negro.

With sweat running from his brow and anger on his face, Mr. McKissick charged at a news conference in a hot basement room of the Harlem Young Men's Christian Association at 180 West 135th Street that the Vice President was a "liberal who has become an Administration boy who has to do what the Administration say he has to do."

Reason for Conference

The news conference, he explained, had been called to correct misinterpretations of the term black power, "to explain the social significance of black power and to answer critics of the [CORE] movement."

The CORE director began the conference calmly. In a prepared statement, he said:

"Black power is no mere slogan. It is a movement dedicated to the exercise of American democracy in its highest tradition; it is a drive to mobilize the black communities of this country in a monumental effort to remove the basic causes of alienation, frustration, despair, low self-esteem and hopelessness."

He added that "black power is not black supremacy, does not mean the exclusion of white Americans from the Negro revolution, does not advocate violence and will not start riots."

Angered by Question

But Mr. McKissick then became visibly angry when asked to comment on remarks made by Mr. Humphrey on Wednesday and by Roy Wilkins the day before at the Los Angeles convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Mr. Wilkins is the executive director of the N.A.A.C.P.

Without using the term "black power," Mr. Humphrey had said:

"Yes, racism is racism—and there is no room in America for racism of any color. And we must reject calls for racism, whether they come from a throat that is white or one that is black."

Mr. Wilkins had denounced the black power aspirations of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and of CORE as well as the modifications in the policy of nonviolence.

'Lack of Contact'

"I think it is regrettable that Mr. Wilkins, a man whom I respect," Mr. McKissick said, "has reached the point where he does not understand the community, possibly because of lack of contact."

He criticized President Johnson for not sending Federal troops into Canton and Philadelphia, Miss., and because "very little money is getting down to us."

Expanding his criticism of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Humphrey, Mr. McKissick said:

"The Administration believes it can solve this problem by giving doses of citizenship to black people like a doctor gives aspirin. I'm sick and tired of taking doses."

Mr. McKissick said the Negro wanted to control his own poverty program and to control urban renewal.

"They passed the Civil Rights Act, then made it a political football," he said, "letting every single Southern Senator and Congressman come up and make a deal not to send voting registrars to their states. Right now the Civil Rights Act is not worth the paper it's printed on."

Asked about a split in the civil rights movement over black power, Mr. McKissick said he thought that CORE was moving in the right direction.

"I don't believe in uniting for the sake of thought control," he said.

MOVEMENT

N.A.A.C.P. Chief Says Their Goals May Have 'Nothing' to Do With Rights'

7/8/66

By M. S. HANDLER

Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, July 7 — Roy Wilkins indicated today that further cooperation between the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Civil Rights organizations advocating black power had become virtually impossible.

In a memorandum to the delegates of the 57th annual N.A.A.C.P. convention, the association's executive secretary traced the bitter controversy that took place during last month's Mississippi rights march.

The memorandum was in effect a response to a challenge flung down by Stokely Carmichael, Floyd B. McKissick and Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer at last week's Congress of Racial Equality convention in Baltiore.

"The refusal of the 'March' organizations," Mr. Wilkins said "to join in a strong nationwide effort to pass the civil rights bill was a civil rights tragedy.

"The Meredith shooting should have been, and could have been, a rallying cry for scores of organizations and groups in a concerted push for the bill.

"The whole business showed the N.A.A.C.P. again how difficult it is to have genuine cooperation, on an equal responsibility basis with groups that do not have the same commitments and which may very well be pursuing certain goals that have nothing to do with civil rights at all."

Revolutionary Stance

Mr. Carmichael, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Mr. McKissick, national director of CORE, and Mrs. Hamer of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party, an emanation of S.N.C.C., took the stance of revolutionaties at the CORE convention challenging the American political system.

They contended the time had come for Negroes in ghettos to organize themselves into local political blocs that could determine elections outside the Democratic and Republican parties.

[At a news conference Thursday in New York, Mr. McKissick charged that Mr. Wilkins "has reached the point where he does not understand the community, possibly because of lack of contact." Details on page 16.]

Mr. Carmichael asserted in Baltimore that integration into American society was irrelevant to the black masses.

Mr. McKissick in his principal address shouted, "I don't want to become a white man," indicating that the principal aspiration of the educated Negro middle class was to become "white" in its standard of living, its mode of living, its thought patterns and social attitudes.

Black Power Denounced

At Tuesday's plenary session of the N.A.A.C.P. convention, Mr. Wilkins took public cognizance of the "black power" challenge for the leadership of the Negro people.

He denounced black power as black racism that could lead to a "black death." He also denounced the S.N.C.C. and CORE modification of the doctrine of nonviolence as one that could lead to white counterforce, lynchings and widespread police actions of repression of the Negro people.

Last night in a speech to the association convention, Vice President Humphrey attacked black racism and aligned the Federal Government behind the N.A.A.C.P.'s program of integrating the Negro people into American society as the only acceptable solution.

In today's memorandum Mr. Wilkins charged that the organizations that rushed to Memphis to sponsor the continuation of James Meredith's interrupted march to Jackson, Miss., rejected the proposal to use the march to bring pressure to bear on Congress to enact the latest civil rights bill.

Johnson Called Target

Instead, Mr. Wilkins said, "they yielded to the wishes of the leaders of S.N.C.C. and CORE who wanted only to 'put President Johnson on the spot' to quote Stokely Carmichael's remark."

Mr. Wilkins said they drew up a "manifesto" that concentrated almost from the opening words on a personal attack on Mr. Johnson. The manifesto, he said, did not urge the passage of the civil rights bill.

"The whole business made us recall,'" Mr. Wilkins went on, "some of the other things that have happened along the way in the course of 'cooperating' with the other groups."

Among the "other things" listed by Mr. Wilkins was the N.A.A.P.'s experience as a member of the Mississippi project called the Council of Federated Organizations. Before withdrawing from that project, the N.A.A.C.P. was sued because of automobile accidents involving S.N.C.C. members and had to settle out of court for $2,500.

Billed for a Plane

"When Harry Belafonte and others turned over to S.N.C.C. some $60,000 which they had raised in Hollywood, a private plane was hired for their use from Memphis, Tenn. to Jackson," the Wilkins memorandum continued.

"The bill amounting to nearly $150 was sent to Charles Evers for payment. P.S. He did not pay it." Mr. Evers is the Mississippi field director of the N.A.A.C.P.

Mr. Wilkins charged that during the N.A.A.C.P. summer voting project in Mississippi," the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party (S.N.C.C. under another name) tried to undermine our work, invaded our office and disrupted it, sought to keep Negroes from joining the effort, and attempted to break up a public meeting addressed by Roy Wilkins." The memorandum also charged:

"An undisclosed amount of money collected by S.N.C.C. to rebuild the Sunflower County Baptist Church never reached the church, which then proceeded to sue the N.A.A.C.P., along with others, because the N.A.A.C.P. had been a 'partner' in COFO and because S.N.C.C. workers, in the name of COFO, had agreed to be responsible if anything happened to the church."

N.A.A.C.P. Supplied Food

Mr. Wilkins asserted that it was the N.A.A.C.P. and its branches that had supplied the food, the housing and transportation along the route of the recent Mississippi march.

At the Sunday rally in Jackson on June 26, he said, the Jackson branch took the responsibility of preparing and distributing food and drinks to more than 10,000 persons.

Among the contributions made by Mr. Evers to the success of the Mississippi march, according to Mr. Wilkins, was the payment of $300 bail money for Mr. Carmichael.

Nevertheless, Mr. Wilkins said, Mr. Evers was barred from the platform, which consisted of a truck that Mr. Evers had hired for the occasion.

"This is only part of the record and some of the payoffs for the N.A.A.C.P. cooperation with S.N.C.C. CORE and the S.C.L.C. (the Southern Christian Leadership Council] and others over many years," Mr. Wilkins said.

"No one for example remembers the $5,000 we sent at the S.C.L.C.'s desperate request for the Selma-Montgomery march in 1965 at a time when we did not know whether we could meet our own payroll. In fact it wasn't until six months later we got a form letter of acknowledgment for only $3,000, and which at the same time asked for more."

This was the first indication for the public record that the relations between the N.A.A.C.P. and the Dr. Martin Luther King's leadership council were strained because of money transactions.

G.O.P. Calls Antipoverty Drive Sham Battle Instead of a War

WASHINGTON, July 7 (AP) —Republicans accused the Johnson Administration today of fighting a sham battle instead of a genuine war against poverty.

The Republican Coordinating Committee, composed of G.O.P. governors, Congressional leaders, state legislators and National Committee members, called for drastic revision of the antipoverty program.

They urged reorganization of the Office of Economic Opportunity, which directs the program, enlarging the roles of state and private industry, and giving top priority to helping the children of the poor.

Attacked in House

Similar recommendations were made recently by Republicans on the House Education and Labor Committee in attacking a bill written by committee Democrats, which would authorize $1.75-billion to carry the antipoverty program through its third year.

The approach favored by the coordinating committee would stress educational programs, employment training, tax incentives for participating business and equal opportunities for the poor.

"It have always been the Republican approach," said the committee report, "to assist the poor and disadvantaged in their climb up the economic and social ladder; not to drag them up forcibly by a green rope of dollar bills."

The Republican program, by requiring heavier contributions from the states, would produce $2.4-billion for the various antipoverty activities, as compared with $1.75-billion under the bill now before the House. The Federal commitment under the Republican bill would be $1.4-billion.

Previous Opposition

Republicans have fought unsuccessfully to revise antipoverty legislation in Congress each year since the program started, but this time they feel their chances for bringing about major changes are improved.

A lack of enthusiasm in the antipoverty agency for the House bill has muted the Administration's lobbying efforts. The bill would put sharp limits on agency spending and transfer some of its administrative duties to other agencies.

And although the bill represents many of the views of Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan, the chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, he has shown little interest in it since it left his committee.

He did not appear during three weeks of hearings on the legislation before the House Rules Committee, and reportedly is in no hurry to have it called up for House action.

Iron Deficiency in Babies Called Major U.S. Problem

INDIANAPOLIS (UPI) — American babies' biggest health problem is iron deficiency anemia, according to an authority on nutrition. Half of all babies suffer from it, he said.

Dr. Robert Jackson, chairman of the department of pediatrics at the University of Missouri, said iron deficiency anemia is especially prevalent in high income groups.

Dr. Jackson was a keynote speaker recently at the La Leche International Convention for Mothers Dedicated to Natural Nursing.

He said the most severe cases of iron deficiency anemia occur when a child is between 9 and 30 months. A baby has an iron reserve for the first six months but must have iron supplied to him after that Dr. Jackson said.

Dr. Jackson said a common cause of the deficiency—and the reason it affected higher income groups — was what he termed "the white diet."

The "white diet" he said, is composed exclusively of milk products to the neglect of colored foods, which contain iron.

DR. KING ASSERTS RIGHTS MOVEMENT IS 'CLOSE' TO SPLIT

7/9/66

Bids Leaders Meet on Black Power Issues — Weighs Civil Disobedience Drive

By GENE ROBERTS
Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, July 8—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said today that the civil rights movement was "very, very close" to a permanent split over the black power issue and that civil rights leaders should meet immediately to patch up their differences.

He said he was also considering a wave of civil disobedience demonstrations in an attempt to pry concessions from Northern cities and provide a "militantly nonviolent" alternative to the black power movement.

In a series of interviews that began yesterday and continued today, the Nobel prize-winning civil rights leader was critical of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality for calling for black power and for defensive violence among Negores.

New Mood Discerned

But he was also critical of the National Association for the Advncement of Colored People for what he thought was a failure to understand the reasons for the new mood of the student committee and CORE.

"I get the impression that the N.A.A.C.P. wouldn't mind a split decause they think they are the only civil rights organization," he said. "But a split wouldn't help any of us, and we're very, very close to one."

He was high in his praise, however, for A. Philip Randolph, Negro president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, who earlier today proposed a meeting of the civil rights leaders.

Dr. King called this a "good idea" and said it might be the only way to avoid a permanent split among civil rights organizations.

Public Officials Blamed

Dr. King attributed the rise of black power sentiment to the failure of public officials and the "power structure" to create meaningful changes in the lives of Negroes.

This, he went on, is creating frustration and despair among Negroes and making them turn to such "desperation" tactics as riots and the black power movement.

One answer, he said, is for him and other civil rights leaders to resort to widespread civil disobedience in an effort to force the "power structure" to come to grips with such Negro problems as "terrible and widespread poverty" and "inadequate education."

"We'll use something that avoids violence, but becomes militant and extreme enough to disrupt the flow of a city," he continued. "I know it will be rough on them [Chicago city officials] when they have to get 200 people off the Dan Ryan [a major expressway here], but the only thing I can tell them is: which do you prefer, this or a riot?"

He said he was also considering sending unemployed Negroes to Chicago's City Hall to "sit there until they get jobs."

From Chicago, he said, this sort of tactic could spread to other cities.

Again and again, in more

than two hours of conversation, he talked of public officials and what he said was their failure to respond to conventional methods of nonviolent protests.

"When they drain the steam out of the nonviolent movement and give no concessions," he said, "they are planting the seeds for a Watts-like situation.

"They have mastered that art in the North," he remarked. "They'll let you march all summer and not give you one thing.

"In Chicago, for example, Mayor [Richard J.] Daley's response was to play tricks with us—to say he's going to end slums but not doing any concrete things.

"He's just trying to stay ahead of us just enough to take the steam out of the movement.

"But he fails to understand that if gains are not made and made in a hurry through responsible civil rights organizations, it will open the door to militant groups to gain a foothold—and those that have tried to be responsible will be driven to more irresponsible deeds and words.

"People have to understand that I can't stop a riot unless I can give people jobs," he went on. "Industry is playing games with us. Even a long-standing ally like labor tolerates building trades unions that won't allow Negroes in them."

Dr. King acknowledged that only a few monhs ago he felt that civil disobedience should be used sparingly, if at all, in the civil rights movement.

But three recent developments have given his thinking a more militant turn:

First, the conviction that there is a growing and potentially violent restiveness among Negroes because of "broken promises" by state, national and local officials.

Second, his difficulty, after six months of intensive work in Chicago—his first Northern civil rights battleground—in winning "meaningful concessions" from the city.

Third, the cries for black power and defensive violence that went up from the members of the Student Committee and CORE on the civil rights march through Mississippi last month.

"My problem with SNCC [the student committee] and CORE," he said, "is not their militancy—I think you can be militantly nonviolent. It's what I see as a pattern of violence emerging and their use of the cry, 'black power,' which, whether they mean it or not, falls on the ear as racism in reverse.

"But I try to understand," he said. "The Negro is in dire need of a sense of dignity and a sense of pride, and I think black power is an attempt to develop pride. And there's no doubt about the need for power—he can't get into the mainstream of society without it.

"But the use of the phrase black power gives the feeling that Negroes can go it alone and that he doesn't need anybody but himself. We have to keep remembering that we are only 10 or 11 per cent of the population."

If Negroes had made genuine, rather than "superficial," progress, he continued, there would not be a black power movement or a danger of violence by Negroes.

"But now," he said, "people have to understand that the choice is no longer between nice little meetings or nonviolence. It is between militant nonviolence and riots."

Dr. King and CORE Chief Act to Heal Rights Breach

MOVEMENT 7/11/66

By AUSTIN C. WEHRWEIN

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, July 10—Two civil rights leaders moved today to heal the widening breach in the national movement over the issue of "black supremacy." The two men addressed a rally of the newly designated Freedom Movement at Soldier Field.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said that "our power is in our unity."

Floyd B. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, who preceded Dr. King as a speaker, said that if Dr. King called for him, he would come because, whatever their ideological differences, they were "brothers."

Roman Catholic Archbishop John P. Cody of Chicago sent a message to the rally that endorsed many of the demands Dr. King is making on the administration of Mayor Richard J. Daley, including a call on real estate boards to support open occupancy.

Church Pledges Aid

Pledging the Archdiocese of Chicago, whose nearly two-and-a-half million members make it the largest in the nation, to the elimination of the last "vestige of discrimination," Archbishop Cody made the strongest archdiocesan statement yet on civil rights.

The rally in Soldier Field on the shore of Lake Michigan—held in a humid, 100-degree setting—drew a crowd estimated by Junius Griffin, public relations aide for Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, at 45,000. The police estimated the crowd at between 25,000 and 30,000. Nearly 100,000 had been expected for the rally and a march on City Hall. Soldier Field can seat nearly 85,000 people.

Despite the assurances, however, both men appeared to remain adamant on what they believed "black supremacy" meant. Dr. King declared:

"A doctrine of black supremacy is as evil as a doctrine of white supremacy."

"The Negro," he said, "needs the white man to free him from his fears. The white man needs the Negro to free him from his guilt."

Mr. McKissick explained that black power meant political power, economic power and a new self-image for Negroes. It does not mean hatred or black supremacy or the exclusion of

He also said black power did not advocate violence but rather the changing of the environment in which riots erupted.

Mr. McKissick introduced as one definition of black power "the developing of a black consumer bloc nationwide able to strike at any concern."

He specifically mentioned automobile agency franchises, saying that if Negroes could not get them for a particular make of car, Negroes should "black out" that make.

Dr. King also called for economic force.

"We must make clear that we will withdraw our money 'en masse' from any bank that does not have a nondiscriminatory lending policy," he said. "We must affirm that we will withraw economic support from any company that will not provide on-the-job training and employ an adequate number of Negroes, Puerto Ricans and other ethnic minorities in the higher paying jobs."

"In short," Dr. King said, "We must not spend our dollars anywhere we are not respected. We must say to every industry, 'If you respect my dollar, you must respect my person.' "

Dr. King also declared that "this day we must decide that our votes will determine who will be the Mayor of Chicago next year."

The mayoral election is next year and Mayor Daley is expected to run again.

Mayor's Reaction Cited

James H. Meredith, who integrated the University of Mississippi and whose being shot set off the recent march in Mississippi also spoke at the rally.

Leaders of the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations, the federated civil rights movement here, and Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference answer questions about gains their joint effort has achieved by pointing out that as soon as Dr. King announced his campaign against slum conditions earlier this year. Mayor Daley drew on antipoverty money to step up programs of rodent control and building code enforcement.

Obviously timed to appear before both the rally and Dr. King's scheduled meeting with him at City Hall tomorrow, the Mayor issued a report on his own programs, the aim of which is the elimination of slum housing by the end of 1967.

Mr. Daley said that in the 18 months before July 1 of this year, 9,226 buildings containing 102,847 dwelling units had been brought into compliance with the codes. During this period, he said, $34-million was spent by Chicago property owners for building repairs.

The Mayor, noting that the rodent control program had utilized $2-million in Federal antipoverty money, called it "the most massive and comprehensive rodent eradication program ever undertaken in this country."

King Rejects 'Black Power' In Slum Fight

MOVEMENT

AJ 7/11/66

CHICAGO (AP)—Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Sunday brushed past signs calling for "black power" to post the demands of his Chicago civil rights movement on the front door of City Hall.

The posting came after a heat-defying antislum rally in Chicago's Soldier Field and a traffic-halting march through the Loop. Better housing, more jobs and better schools were among the demands.

Earlier, King linked arms with civil rights leaders, including Floyd McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, to form a common front in the struggle for Negro equality.

McKissick, who at first had said he might not be able to attend the rally, told the crowd of some 35,000 that the concept of black power had been misinterpreted, that it meant only that Negroes "have a right to determine their own futures."

He called for a "united black consumer bloc that would be able to strike at any concern," and ended his speech with a pledge to come to Dr. King's aid at any time — "He's my brother."

King recently has been in disagreement with McKissick and other advocates of black power.

James H. Meredith, first known Negro graduate of the University of Mississippi, who was wounded during a recent march to Jackson, Miss., told the rally that all civil rights groups must join to fight "the system of white supremacy."

The slogan "black power" was seen in crudely painted signs, and heard in the chants of clutches of young Negroes and in the words of some of the many speakers at the rally.

Before King spoke, 150 persons delayed the rally several minutes when they paraded about the center of the field crying "black power!" and waving signs. One sign read "We Shall Overcome" and carried a picture of a machine gun. Some of the group identified themselves as members of the Blackstone Rangers, a teen-age gang on the South Side.

King told the crowd:

"Within the white community there exists a substantial group of white Americans who cherish democratic principles above the privilege, and who have demonstrated a will to fight with the Negro against injustice.

"The Negro needs the white man to free him from his fears. The white man needs the Negro to free him from his guilt.

"I must reaffirm that I do not seek the answer to our problems in violence. Our movement's adherence to nonviolence has been a major factor in the creation of a moral climate that has made progress possible.

"This climate may well be dissipated not only by acts of violence, but by the threat of it verbalized by those who equate it with militancy."

Then King added:

"Our power does not exist in Molotov cocktails, rifles, knives and bricks. Our power is in our unity, the force of our souls and the determination of our bodies."

Panther slogans on the Meredith March in Mississippi: For whites, a chilling vision of black revenge

'BLACK POWER': POLITICS OF FRUSTRATION

In the decade since its birth, the American Negro revolt has summed up its aspirations in a one-word battle cry—"Freedom!"—and in the promise of an old hymn that black and white together would overcome some day. But Freedom Road had taken a disconcerting new turn last week by the time the James H. Meredith March arrived 12,000 strong at the steps of the Mississippi State capitol in Jackson. Counterpointed against the old call for freedom was a catchy new slogan: "Black Power!" And the deep store of anger and alienation it stood for posed a grave new challenge for that loose and factious assortment of groups known perhaps too optimistically as the Movement.

Most visible among the advocates of Black Power were angular, young (at 25) Stokely Carmichael and his radical confreres of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. They, in turn, rode the crest of a new wave of "black consciousness" that has lately divided the Movement by calling some of its most basic assumptions into question. SNCC speaks for a growing bloc of the disaffected when it argues that the old goal of integration is irrelevant to most Negroes today, that a black man ought to hit back when a white man hits him, that white liberals are all right only if they know their place and stay in it. What black consciousness offers instead is a turn inward: a militant pride in being Negro—and a do-it-yourself thrust for black economic and political power as prerequisites for real equality.

The discordant new sound has roots and, sometimes, rhetoric in common with the old-line black nationalists who have harangued at the edges of the big-city ghettos for years. Beyond that, its advocates insist, the resemblance is mostly skin deep. The evangels of black consciousness are not interested in going back to Africa, or setting up a partitioned black nation within the U.S., or stockpiling guns for some apocalyptic war of the races—all conventional aspirations on the nationalist fringe. They say they do not hate Whitey, as nationalists commonly do; they merely mistrust him. Nor will they shoot at him—unless he shoots first.

Exit Lewis: But they pose a very real crisis for the Movement nonetheless—a crisis of allegiance among Negroes and of confidence among sympathetic whites. The Meredith March itself was something of a coup for black-conscious SNCC: it could not compete with Martin Luther King for star quality but it rode his coattails and helped shape the message that the march delivered to the nation. And the message, whenever SNCC was on camera, was Black Power—an unprogramed catch phrase with the immediate effect of titillating Negroes and frightening whites. The debate provoked divisions reaching even into SNCC's own ranks; fiery John Lewis, 26, a charter member and Carmichael's predecessor as national chairman, quit SNCC last week with a parting shot at the new lingo. And King went home to Atlanta in dismay, forced to concede that Carmichael had stolen the show. The result, he said dolefully, was to confuse "many of our white friends" at a time when money was short in the Movement and yet another civil-rights bill lay on the line. And, he added, the cry of "Black Power" had sparked a "misguided hatred of white people among some Negroes."

King himself, dreaming his eloquent dreams of nonviolence and integration, suddenly stood for everything that black consciousness challenges. All the civil-rights laws and court decrees and poverty programs, so the argument runs, have not substantially altered the conditions of Negro life in the Northern ghetto or the Southern backwaters. By that bleak yardstick, patience for nonviolence wears thin and finally snaps—as it did last week in a midnight Negro-white melee in Cordele, Ga. And integration becomes mere pie in the sky to be portioned out by whites to those few middle-class Negroes they find acceptable. A "subterfuge for white supremacy," SNCC's Carmichael calls it—and a Washington militant elaborates: "King is not raising serious issues, he's talking about integrated cups of coffee. Nobody is concerned about true integration any more. If you were to integrate the Statler-Hilton tomorrow, 99.9 per cent of the ghetto can't come there—they can't afford it."

Pride and Destiny: Instead, SNCC offers the evanescent dream of Black Power—a mix of cynicism and romanticism that sounds realistic until it confronts the final reality that Negroes make up only 10 per cent of the U.S. population. Their first premise is that the Negro must be taught pride in himself; then, whether he lives in Harlem or Watts or Black Belt Dixie, he must organize to take control of his own destiny.

But how? The approach is beguilingly obvious in a mostly Negro backwater such as Alabama's Lowndes County, the seedbed of SNCC's Black Panther third-party movement, and it may seem equally plain at that future time when Negroes outnumber whites in the great cities of the North. Theoretically, Black Power can assert itself by electoral arithmetic: the Negro vote will assure Negro rights. But the means are vague where whites outnumber Negroes. SNCC's hot-eyed theoreticians talk dreamily of striking coalitions with separate-but-equally-radical "white panther" parties; their Los Angeles chapter, just as romantically, proposed that Watts simply secede from the city.

Flag Burning: So Black Power—for all its militant ring—still remains more style than substance, more point of view than program. At one stop on the Meredith March, Carmichael cried, "You ought to get the nappiest-headed black man, with the broadest nose and thickest lips, and make him sheriff. This isn't anti-white—it's just a way of sayin' we're not ashamed of bein' black." And Carmichael's fire-eating side man, Willie Ricks, made the boss seem mild. He dressed for the march in a black suit, shirt and tie; he talked about burning down courthouses and letting white blood flow with black; he decried the American flag ("A bunch of lies") and burned the Confederate stars-and-bars in a last provocative show at the capitol steps. Such words and deeds are the new SNCC style, which seeks patently to chill whites with visions of a black revenge—but then goes to great pains to explain to newsmen that Black Power is pro-Negro, not anti-white.

If it is not nationalism, SNCC's new language has the ring of prophecy fulfilled to the nationalists of the ghettos. They are an old, ill-sorted and perpetually splintered part of the scenery, a mix of Muslim ascetics peddling their papers, African revivalists in gaudy tribal costume, putative black guerrilla warriors commonly said to be hoarding guns and poring over plans of city water systems. Their exemplars today are the likes of the Muslims' Elijah Muhammad, the fezzed Messenger of Allah to the Lost-Found Nation of Islam in the Wilderness of North America; grizzled old "Professer" Lewis Michaux, who presides over a Harlem nationalist bookstore with a backroom black hall of fame that curiously includes pictures of FDR, Dwight Eisenhower and Douglas MacArthur; Oakland's Curtis Lee Baker, who is styled "Black Jesus" and goes abroad with a black beret, a black cape and an ill-tempered Doberman Pinscher; and Watts' Ron Karenga, a shaven-headed, goateed M.A. in political science who propounds, in Swahili, a seven-point plan ranging from umoja (unity) to imani (faith).

Andre Serfati

Karenga: 'Umoja, Imani'

'Black Is Beautiful': It is an alien world, festooned with posters ("Black Is Beautiful"), absorbed in books (one current favorite: Ché Guevara on guerrilla warfare) and so obsessed with its own scholastic debates that it has never been able to unite behind a single effective leader—not even Malcolm X. But urban cops still keep a wary eye on such clandestine groups as the gun-conscious Revolutionary Action Movement—and on anti-white youth groups like Harlem's Five Percenters, actually a loose assemblage of more or less violently inclined gangs said to number perhaps 1,000 in all.

And beyond the compass of the various groups are what one savvy Watts leader calls the "do-rag nationalists"—the bitter young men who lounge at every corner, their freshly straightened hair "dos" held flat against their heads with black kerchiefs. "They just stand around blowin' against Whitey," he says, and they are the dynamite in the ghetto—the likeliest to be ignited by indiscriminate cries of Black Power.

Nowhere, indeed, is the meld of black nationalism and black consciousness so prominent as in postwar Watts. Frederick J. Hacker, a psychologist who studied last August's riot, wrote in Frontier magazine that it had left "a strange sense of pride and accomplishment which is actually the finding of a national and racial identity." That feeling is as visible as the omnipresent T-shirts emblazoned with pictures of Malcolm X or with proud declarations that the wearer is a veteran of the "first" Watts revolt. Nationalist groups like Karenga's US still have relatively few members, but the bold spirit of black consciousness pervades the community. Thus SNCC's secession plan for Watts drew a chorus of approving statements—among them one from the local president of the impeccably moderate NAACP.

Carmichael: A new way of talking

Even in cooler climes, black consciousness is seeping deep into the Movement. In Washington, SNCC's Marion Barry—leader of the pro-home-rule Free D.C. movement—tried the Black Power slogan tentatively at a few rallies last week and went away "slightly astonished" at the roaring response it evoked. CORE says its 1966 "target city" campaign in Baltimore (NEWSWEEK, June 6) is aimed less at integration than at developing "the potential of the ghetto community"; some of its top leaders, in fact, claim to have minted the Black Power approach a year ahead of SNCC.

Integration Is Out: The rallying cry for King's own campaign in Chicago is not "integrate" but "end slums"; the means, in effect, is Black Power without calling it that. "Integration as a goal went out a year ago," says one staffer. "The only reason we want any Negroes to move into white communities is because the ghetto is overcrowded."

Mainstream leaders find it easy enough to understand where the Black Power play came from. "Many people," said King, "are terribly frustrated about broken promises, deferred dreams and the slow pace of the nation rectifying the basic ills confronting the Negro community." Beneath its chauvinistic overtones, indeed, some see it as a psychic phase the Negro must pass through on his way to full equality: a period of group identity and solidarity comparable (as SNCC is fond of pointing out) to the experience of the Irish, the Italians

SNCC Head Lists Black Power Aims

MOVEMENT

AC 7/14/66

By LEE SIMOWITZ

"Black power is the coming together of black people and electing representatives and forcing them to speak to their needs."

This was how Stokely Carmichael, head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the man whom many consider the symbol of "black power," defined the term Wednesday night.

Carmichael was participating in a debate at Spelman College with Randolph Blackwell of the Southern Christian Leadership Council, but the event was more Carmichael than debate.

AMAZES HIM

"It's amazing to see what two words can do to white America," said Marmichael, commenting on the violent public reaction to "black power."

Carmichael explained what he felt the catchword meant, though he disclaimed responsibility for coining it.

"We don't seek to become part of white society," he said. "We don't want anything to do with it."

WANTS NO PART

SNCC wants to disassociate itself from white society, Carmichael said, because it feels the society is "morally bankrupt." He repeatedly referred to the Viet Nam war.

The disassociation is also necessary, he said, because white allies of the civil rights movement try to impose a program on it rather than helping Negroes reach their own goals.

"The civil rights movement can take care of its enemies, but God deliver us from our friends, "Carmichael said, drawing a burst of laughter from a half-white, half-Negro crowd packed into a hot classroom.

WHAT IT MEANS

Black power means political power, Carmichael explained, and he mentioned better jobs, education and housing as some of the goals it could help Negroes attain.

He dismissed the question of violence and non-violence as irrelevant — unless the country blocks the Negroes' way to their goals.

Carmichael stressed the need for Negro self-reliance and self-respect. "Black people have to move to psychological equality," he said. "They have to get things for themselves."

Blackwell and Carmichael disagreed on the possibility of a Negro-white coalition. Blackwell held up the ideal of interracial cooperation as it existed, he said, in parts of the Populist party.

"There is a portion of our society that is ready to give up on American society and its capacity to change," Blackwell said. "We are full of change."

Carmichael insisted that there is no economic basis for a coalition between Negroes and whites.

RAPS BIGOTRY

"I've worked from the assumption that this country is racist from top to bottom, from left to right," he said.

Carmichael said that more work needs to be done in the white community than the Negro community, by erasing bigotry and electing leaders who will represent the true interest of the majority of whites.

NO VIOLENCE

He also said that integration is meaningless without an attack on Negro poverty. American Negroes are property-less, he added, and therefore powerless.

Blackwell reiterated SCLC's commitment to non-violence and said he believed the 20th century's problems are more complex than the race issue alone.

He added that dissention within the civil rights movement must be expected. "It's a mistake to assume that we're going to stay coalesced down to the end," he said.

Stokely Carmichael: The Style Is Familiar

The comic style of Stokely Carmichael suggests Dick Gregory, but his social philosophy is strictly black Bilbo.

We Southerners in particular should recognize the technique, since demagogues dot our historical landscape. We know them best in white skin, but the basic rules work for any race, creed or color.

It's simple. You know what's frustrating your audience. You recite each grievance. You pick a villain. You tell them what you're going to do to the bad guys one of these days. Practical solutions are not important. Energetic denunciations are.

The Snick leader's style is one part humor, two parts shock.

"You're not good guys," he says of whites; "You're rotten." No greys. No exceptions. Everything white is black, and everything black is white. There isn't a single white person he trusts, Carmichael told a group at Spelman College the other night. Then he sat back to enjoy the spectacle of earnest whites falling all over themselves to say, in effect, "Surely you don't mean to include me." He tells them he does.

But Carmichael would have limited entertainment value if he were just angry and audacious. He also plays for laughs. "Everywhere I go, white liberals say (and here his voice feigns panic), 'You gonna put me out?' "

Of whites in control of federal anti-poverty funds, he says: "It's like the Bible—'Only through Me.' " And then giggles happily at his own joke: "Heh, heh, heh." The audience joins him.

Or of the motives of Berkeley-type student movemnts: "Be serious. Those college kids are fighting for the right to grow beards and smoke pot."

Maybe the delivery is more Godfrey Cambridge than Dick Gregory. For a part of the time that Southern Christian Leadership Conference's Randolph Blackwell was speaking, Carmichael stared at the floor, his heavy eyelids giving an impression of deep repose. But suddenly, at some point he disliked, he grimaced or rolled his eyes like Olivier playing Othello.

As Carmichael spoke of white injustices and Negro nonviolence, his own words fueled inner fires. The sentences came faster, and increasingly he used his arms for punctuation. He has not the carefully crescendoed rhythm or compelling voice of a Martin Luther King. It's slow slum argot, interspersed with "baby," or it's all speed and energy.

In essence, what is he saying?

America is racist top to bottom, left to right. White liberals are insincere. Whites want nonviolence for Negroes, but not for themselves. Snick wants "the white man off our back" and its cut of American affluence. The only way Negroes will achieve what they want will be with political force, and erstwhile white allies will have to be shoved aside because whites always want to run things their own way.

Carmichael frequently speaks of "psychological equality," unshackling the chains of subservience. His many references to Africa are part of his effort to provide Negroes new identity.

Giving Negroes self-respect of course is an aim of all civil rights organizations. Participation in movements such as the lunch counter sit-ins earlier in this decade did much to give young Negroes a feeling of worth and accomplishment, for example. But Carmichael's method carries the high price tag of alienation from the white society instead of reconciliation.

Not only self-respect, but the keystone of Carmichael's edifice—black political power—has been a longtime goal of almost all civil rights groups. So he can't carve out his own niche there. He does have a chance for prominence by force of his own charisma, which rests on the emotional catharsis of denouncing Whitey.

Of course Carmichael denies that. He treats Negro voting like something he invented. Then he will make some abusive remark about whites and next demand in injured tones: "Is that racist?"

Carmichael's political philosophy is incoherent. He would have Negroes withdraw from the "corrupt" America that bombs Viet Nam, but does not explain how Negroes can withdraw from paying taxes to support American policy. He says he will translate black political power into black economic power, but fails to say how it can be done.

Above all, he is weakest in explaining how Negroes—a decided minority nationally—can achieve power without entering a coalition with whites. He will giggle and mimic someone saying: "But how can you do it with only 10 per cent of the population?" The giggle may suggest to his audience that he is unconcerned with that detail. Maybe he is. But black power cannot go it alone, and he has no answer for that.

Given a tough question, Carmichael has a fleet of dodges: "You'll have to ask the white press. I didn't raise the issue (of violence and nonviolence) . . . I will cross that bridge when I come to it . . . I won't tell you what I'm going to do. You tell me what you're going to do.

But little matter. A viable political system is not his forte. Stirring the emotions is.

"I don't think the people of Watts were extreme," he told his Spelman audience. ". . . I've had so much 'law and order,' I swear to God I want a little chaos."

He doubtless will get it.

MOVEMENT NYT 7/23/66

Four officials of the Congress of Racial Equality were ejected yesterday from the United States mission to the United Nations, where they were protesting United States ties with South Africa.

A fifth demonstrator, who stationed himself in front of the 45th Street entrance, was arrested when he refused to move on. The mission is at the corner of 45th Street and United Nations Plaza, the name for First Avenue as it passes the United Nations headquarters building.

The four officials were Herb Callender, CORE's national director of organization; Ford Johnson, of its committee against apartheid; Henry Smith, Suffolk County CORE chairman, James Porter of the Bronx chapter. They remained seated on the ground in front of the entrance.

They were ejected from the building by Federal authorities but were not arrested.

A brief skirmish began when the captain in charge of the Federal guards at the building leaped upon one of the seated CORE officials.

He was pulled off by city policemen. One of them told the demonstrators and the Federal guards: "Let's all take it cool. Let's take it easy."

Mr. Callender and Mr. Johnson were carried out of the building by General Service Administration guards and Federal marshals. Mr. Smith and Mr. Porter walked out.

A spokesman for the mission said the four had originally asked to see Arthur J. Goldberg, United States representative at the United Nations. He is in Geneva for United Nations talks on a treaty to ban the uses of space.

Instead, the spokesman said, the four met with Ernest C. Grigg 3d, a political adviser on the United States delegation, who said their demands would be considered.

When the mission closed at 6 P.M., the four CORE officials, who were still sitting, were told that they were trespassing on Government property and would have to leave. They refused and the ejections followed.

The skirmish began when Lincoln Lynch, associate national director of CORE, pointed to a rip in Mr. Callender's jacket and told the city policemen and Federal guards, "You'll have to pay for this."

The demonstrator wha was seized was identified by Mr. Lynch as Leonard Dechamps, 16 years old, of the Harlem chapter of CORE.

The theme of the demonstration, which began at 3:20 P.M., was a demand that "the United States Government take immediate steps to end all economic, military and political intercourse with South Africa." CORE opposes the South African Government's policy of apartheid, or rigid racial segregation.

About 80 demonstrators with picket signs were marching in front of the 45th Street and United Nations Plaza entrances of the mission.

At 6:45 P.M., Mr. Callender, still seated outside the mission with the three other CORE officials, said, "We received the same treatment from the United States Government as we would have expected from the South African Government."

South Africans Back Home

Special to The New York Times

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, July 22—Cheers, flags, hymne and pdayers greeted the four men who represented South Africa at the World Court case on South-West Africa when they arrived from The Hague today.

Several hundred people at the airport cheered as the four men, D. P. de Villiers, R. F. Botha, R. Eksteen and G. van R. Muller, were welcomed by the Deputy Mayor of Pretoria.

The International Court of Justice ruled, 8 to 7, that South Africa's imposition of apartheid in the mandated territory of South-West Africa was not subject to decision on a complaint by Libera and Ethiopia. The Court said the complaints did not have sufficient legal interest in the case.

MOVEMENT

'Black Power' Assailed By Atlanta Clergymen

By MARGARET HURST

The emergence of the "black power" slogan is largely a reaction to many years of white supremacy and suppression of the Negro, some Atlanta religious leaders believe.

But the leaders also condemned the slogan as being no better than white racism and supremacy.

Atlanta's Catholic Archbishop, Paul J. Hallinan said that because churches in the South have, in the past, failed to intervene in behalf of the Negro, white power has run wild in the suppression of the black race.

"Since his legal freedom in 1865, the black man was kept from decent housing, good education, a paying job and the vote," the archbishop said.

"White power, within and without the law, was the only force in racial relations. 'Black power' is simply the other side of a dirty coin," Archbishop Hallinan said.

The Catholic leader believes that the black power slogan is "wrong, contagious, misleading and a betrayal of 20 million people."

He said that the non-violence of civil rights leaders such as Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. of the Southern Christian Leadership Council and Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has moved the Negro forward and upward.

"The preachers of "black power" are pushing them backward and downward," he added.

The Rev. John Morris, director of Atlanta's Episcopal Society for Racial and Cultural Unity agrees that black power is, in part, an outcropping of white racism and suppression.

The Rev. Mr. Morris said that he agrees with Stokely Carmichael (the creator of the "black power" slogan) that "our society is riddled through with racism." But he adds that "It's unrealistic to believe that the Negro can go it alone."

He said that Negroes are not strong enough numerically to make black power politically viable.

He finds it understandable that Carmichael came up with the slogan after working for some time in Lowndes County, Alabama, where "there are no white liberals or moderates and black power is relevant because there is no hope of reconciliation between the minority racist community and the black majority." But he added, "its ridiculous to talk about black power in the South or the nation."

The Rev. Mr. Morris said, "When we start having the same kind of random violence by blacks against whites as we have seen for years in the reverse, it will not be altogether amiss to attribute some of the responsibility to the black power movement—as the white racism politicians of the South bear a part of the burden for what smaller white men have done in the past."

"A lot of the white scare of black power is symptomatic of the fear whites have of Negroes," the Rev. Mr. Morris said.

Rev. Harwood Bartlett, Episcopal chaplain to Georgia Tech, said the "black power" cry is divisive because it sets one man above another.

However, he adds, "White people have been in this power position over Negroes for so long that its morally hard for the white race to throw many stones at Negroes for crying "black power" since whites have been crying "white power" for so long."

He feels, though, that Negroes will never be in a position to capitalize on black power.

Hand That Fed Them Biting Back at Violent Rightists

AC 7/25/66 MOVEMENT

By EDWARD C. BURKS

NEW YORK — The northern liberal, fearful of extremism, is cutting back sharply on contributions to the more militant civil rights organizations.

The big drop in donations from the liberal community is verified by top officials and well-informed former leaders of the Congress of Racial Equality, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, popularly called "SNICK," and the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Money from white persons has been the lifeblood of their campaigns.

In a series of interviews over the last two weeks, officials of those organizations and civil rights donors gave three main reasons for the drop in financial support. The reasons are:

1. Concern over CORE and SNICK attitudes that are described by many persons as "black racist," anti-semitic or "extreme."

2. Worry or disgust about bitter attacks, primarily by CORE and "SNICK," on United States intentions and on "morality" in Viet Nam and on the military draft.

3. A decline of enthusiasm now that the northerner is being jostled by civil rights militancy in his own backyard.

BLACK POWER STRESS

Both CORE and the student committee have recently emphasized demands for "black power" in political and economic life. Dr. King demands a "militant thrust forward" by Negroes but deplores use of the term "black power" as implying black nationalist ideas. His organization reports contributions down by more than one-third in the fiscal year ending June 30.

The Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, vice president and treasurer of the leadership conference, says that "black power" demands and allegedly "racist" attitudes of CORE and "SNICK" have seriously affected the King organization because many whites do not differentiate among the organizations.

Lincoln Lynch, associate national director of CORE, says that contributions fell significantly after a CORE official at Mount Vernon, N.Y., angrily denounced Jews in general at a public meeting in February.

According to Lynch about 80 per cent of his group's fniancial support has come from the white community, "and you could say that Jewish contributions have been predominant."

Former high-ranking national officials of CORE, recently resigned but still in close touch with the situation, say that contributions to it this year are running only little better than half of the $810,000 total of the previous fiscal year.

FIGURES UNDISCLOSED

Lynch denies such a severe drop but does not disclose the figures. He concedes that the deficit is between $200,000 and $250,000. Former CORE leaders put it as high as $350,000.

Ivanhoe Donaldson, new director of the New York office of SNICK, which operates primarily in the South but has frankly depended on white northern financial help, says:

"Our contributions are 40 to 45 per cent less than we normally have at this time of year."

He adds that the student committee is no longer supported "by those liberal whites who believe in integration in the South but not New York or Chicago."

Now the organization has the help of the radicals, he says.

The student committee charges the northern press with "distortions" about the meaning of "black power," causing liberals to worry about "racism" and "Black nationalism."

Dr. King's conference says that 70 per cent of its financial help has come from white liberals but that contributions dropped off from $1.5 million in the fiscal year 1965 to less than $1 million in 1966.

There are indications that much money from whites is being shifted from CORE and SNICK to more conservative rights groups or to educational and legal defense organizations benefiting the Negro.

INTEREST LESSENS

Civil rights leaders and donors report a general slackening in northern interest after the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and last year's voting rights law. A long-time CORE national executive sums up that attitude:

"Bull Connor and his police dogs were such easy targets to hate a few years ago."

He referred to Eugene Connor, who used dogs to check demonstrators when he was Birmingham police commissioner.

Many observers and leaders of the civil rights struggle believe that it is too early to assess the full impact of the new "black power" slogan. But they point to other related factors, described as "racist" or "extremist," attitudes as having a depressing effect for many months.

Militant Rights Groups Feel Pinch as Gifts Drop

Black Power and Apple Pie

CORE has had a vast turnover in executive personnel, including fund raisers, in recent months, and the former top men are more willing to talk than the present leaders. Nevertheless, while they disagree with various tactics of the organization, several former national officials made clear in interviews that they were all for the "black power" concept. One said:

"Floyd McKissick isn't attacking American structure. Black power is as American as mom's apple pie—it's the idea of an ethnic group banding together to engage in bloc voting and bloc competition.

"CORE is on the right track because the profound questions of education, housing and jobs for the Negro have not been touched. There is terrific frustration in the Negro community."

Former CORE leaders, while reluctant to be named, are outspoken about what they call inept handling of the "Mount Vernon ruckus." Clifford A. Brown, the organization's educational director there, shocked Jews last winter in a fiery denunciation, declaring that Hitler second-class citizen, like a Southern segregationist would —and it's about time we stopped this."

Allen Gartner, treasurer of CORE from 1963 to 1965 and now director of Suffolk County's antipoverty program, declares:

"There has been some hard thinking by white supporters in the North. More and more they see some awful problems right here. This means that some people who were willing to be generous when it was a case of helping Negroes down South are not so generous here."

James Farmer, the organization's former national head, believes it is too early to say how the "black power" slogan will affect CORE.

"But one can speculate," he says, adding: "My guess is that it will affect CORE adversely until it is fully explained."

More conservative Negro organizations and those devoted to legal defense and education are faring much better. The Urban League, the Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality, and the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., classified by the Government as non-profit, tax-exempt organizations, receive large support from white foundations. Generally foundation aid is limited to that of organization.

The Urban League reports an over-all budget of $2,870,000. The N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense Fund, corporately separate from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, reports income from contributions tripled in five years — reaching $1,705,000 in 1965, and $770,000 the first half of 1966.

The Fund for Racial Equality puts its total of contributions at $231,000 for the first 10 months of the 1966 fiscal year, compared with $170,000 for all of fiscal 1965.

"I know one big contributor who tore up his check when "Snick" started that 'black panther' political party in Ala-

(He referred to a new all-black party in one Alabama county.)

Some prominent liberal supporters, mainly Jewish, of CORE and the student committee are not at all distressed by the new emphasis on "black power" and will continue giving. They interpret "black power" as the classic American political device, fully constitutional, of trying to obtain "power commensurate with your numbers." But most concede that the "black power" slogan has caused considerable concern among some acquaintances.

Mrs. Jo Ann Levinson of New York, daughter of Albert A. List, the corporation executive who set up the List Foundation, still finds CORE and "Snick" are "much more to the point" than other civil rights groups. She believes that Floyd B. McKissick, CORE's new director, has explained "black power" as a legitimate, nonseparatist aspiration.

News Accounts Assailed

Michael Schwerner, Manhattan businessman whose son, Michael, was one of three civil rights volunteer workers murdered at Philadelphia, Miss., two years ago, continues his "complete support for 'Snick' and CORE."

He believes that the press has carried "garbled versions" of the "black power" doctrine enunciated by Stanley Carmichael, student committee director, making it appear racist or separatist.

"I don't think 'black power' is an invitation to violence," he says. "I don't consider it a new position but an emphasis. I think it's addressed to Negro people who have been fearful of asserting their constitutional rights."

Mr. and Mrs. Schwerner are taking part in the student committee's new fund-raising mailing aimed at 44,000 previous contributors. Other Jewish liberals maintaining their support to CORE or "Snick" or both include: R. Peter Strauss, owner of radio station WMCA ("These issues are the most important of our time"); Peter Weiss, lawyer and official of the American Jewish Congress ("we ought to send Floyd McKissick an extra $100); and Victor Rabinowitz ("I personally made fairly large contributions to 'Snick' and don't intend to pull back").

Black Power and Apple Pie

Former CORE leaders, while reluctant to be named, are outspoken about what they call inept handling of the "Mount Vernon ruckus." Clifford A. Brown, the organization's educational director there, shocked Jews last winter in a fiery denunciation, declaring that Hitler had not done enough.

In the eyes of many Jews, CORE failed to make a thorough and immediate disavowal of Brown's statement. Several major Jewish contributors resigned from the advisory board before CORE expelled Mr. Brown and suspended the chapter.

One of those who resigned was Will Maslow, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, he says, "all I hear now is alienation and resentment among former white supporters of CORE."

Anti-Jewish Remarks

Another, Joseph Willen, executive of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, has switched his support to the National Urban League and to the Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality, set up by friends and staff people of CORE in 1962, but separate in operation.

CORE, he says, has apparently decided not to be an interracial group any longer, "and the opposite of that is racist." He speaks of a Negro attack "on their neighbors, the Jews."

Mr. Willen adds: "Jews are disturbed about what they fear is growing anti-Semitism among Negroes," noting the many Jewish stores attacked by Negroes in ghetto riots in Chicago and New York.

He tells of a recent talk with a CORE official, who, he says, made sharply anti-Jewish remarks to his face.

"I felt," he says, "that I was treating him almost as a patient and not as a peer, by refusing to get angry. Yet if he had been a white Protestant I would have slapped his face.

"Then I thought that tolerance to such irrational behavior was really treating him like a now director of Suffolk County's antipoverty program, declares:

"There has been some hard thinking by white supporters in the North. More and more they see some awful problems right here. This means that some people who were willing to be generous when it was a case of helping Negroes down South are not so generous here."

James Farmer, the organization's former national head, believes it is too early to say how the "black power" slogan will affect CORE.

"But one can speculate," he says, adding: "My guess is that it will affect CORE adversely until it is fully explained."

More conservative Negro organizations and those devoted to legal defense and education are faring much better. The Urban League, the Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality, and the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., classified by the Government as non-profit, tax-exempt organizations, receive large support from white foundations. Generally foundation aid is limited to that of organization.

The Urban League reports an over-all budget of $2,870,000. The N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense Fund, corporately separate from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, reports income from contributions tripled in five years — reaching $1,705,000 in 1965, and $770,000 the first half of 1966.

The Fund for Racial Equality puts its total of contributions at $231,000 for the first 10 months of the 1966 fiscal year, compared with $170,000 for all of fiscal 1965.

HOUSING PROGRAM INVITES SPONSORS

Nonprofit Groups Are Asked to Join Fight on Poverty

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, July 25 — The Office of Economic Opportunity has opened a new venture in housing for the poor.

The departure is an invitation to nonprofit organizations to join in the fight against poverty as project sponsors, even if they have no previous experience and no money. The O.E.O. will advance the money to hire the expertise for the sponsor.

Private contractors will do the work on a normal, profit-making basis.

The policy also is a challenge to organized labor to modernize its strict craft lines. Since the emphasis will be on rehabilitation of housing, with new construction taking a subordinate role, there will be a need for workmen in a category to be known as "rehabilitation mechanic." This work would probably cross many union jurisdiction lines.

The new policy also contemplates a training program to develop construction skills among the low-income groups.

No Financing Problem

Al Walsh, a housing expert, and Oscar Ornati, and economist, who developed the policy in the O.E.O., foresee no serious financing problem in a tight money market. The banks could advance short-term construction loans and would not be saddled with the mortgages.

Forty-year mortgages, negotiated locally at a rate below the market rate, would carry a 100 per cent Federal Housing Administration guarantee and presumably could be easily sold.

The novelty of the policy is O.E.O.'s advancement of money. Any stable nonprofit institution, or club, with no knowledge of housing, could hire experts needed to do the development work before a contractor appeared on the site.

The O.E.O. expects to get most of its money back eventually. The mortgage would include the development costs. This money would be returned to the sponsor when the mortgage was sold. Thus, the sponsor would have a revolving fund as long as it continued to be a sponsor. When it ceased sponsoring, the money would go back to O.E.O.

Grant Is Announceda

IT IS NOT ENOUGH TO CONDEMN BLACK POWER

In light of recent discussions about tactics and goals of the civil rights movement I thought it might be helpful if I could share some of my experience and thought.

The introduction of the slogan "Black Power" has caused substantial confusion and alarm. It arouses apprehension because some of its advocates approve the use of violence to force social change and with it, Negro separatism. Confusion arises because others use the same slogan to urge acquisition of political power in areas where Negroes are a majority. They limit violence to use in self-defense. I think the following points should be considered:

1 The slogan was an unwise choice at the outset. With the violent connotations that now attach to the words it has become dangerous and injurious. I have made it clear that for SCLC and myself adherence to nonviolence and Negro-White unity is an imperative. Our method is related to our objective. We have never sought the moral goal of freedom and equality by immoral means. Black supremacy or aggressive black violence is as invested with evil as white supremacy or white violence.

2 The slogan "Black Power" in its extremist's sense is supported by but a tiny minority of Negroes. During the past weeks I have marched with more than 30,000 Negroes in Mississippi and another 60,000 in Chicago. I cannot question that these brutal facts of Negro life exist. I differ with the extremist solution. SCLC was the first Negro organization to offer mass nonviolent direct action as an effective alternative to violence. Our demonstrations, boycotts, civil disobedience and political action in Negro-White unity won significant victories. In our judgment it remains the method that can succeed. In this conviction the vast majority of Negroes are still with us. Even more than this, I confidently believe that the call for "Black Power" will rapidly diminish. Many of those who seek relief through its emotional catharsis will return to the disciplined ranks of nonviolent direct action. The "Black Power" slogan comes not from a sense of strength but from a feeling of weakness and desperation. It will vanish when Negroes are effectively organized and supported by self-confidence.

Some established Negro leaders are bitterly denouncing the black power advocates and urge that they be treated as untouchables. I think this will tend to increase extremist behavior as it convinces extremists that the more privileged Negro is joining the white oppressor to perpetuate poverty and discrimination. Some of the Negroes advocating violence argue that whenever one of their number is murdered or brutalized, the white power structure appoints another middle class Negro to a highly paid position. They then move to an equally fallacious position urging that the poor Negro turn against the "middle class" Negro. This mutual fostering of disunity is the road to disaster for all.

The grant will assist the fund in hiring an administrative staff that will provide expertise and stimulate nonprofit sponsors in the use of F.H.A. funds. It is understood that about 10 similar grants will be made shortly.

The focus is on housing for families at the poverty level without the subsidy that goes with public housing.

The objective is to provide for example, a three-bedroom apartment to house a family of seven at a monthly rental of $97 to $102. A city family of seven with an annual income below $4,630 would be considered within the economic definition of poverty. Such a family would thus pay roughly 25 per cent of its income for housing.

2 The slogan "Black Power" in its extremist's sense is supported by but a tiny minority of Negroes. During the past weeks I have marched with more than 30,000 Negroes in Mississippi and another 60,000 in Chicago. It can safely be said that despite passionate and emotional appeals for "Black Power" over 90% of these dedicated activists remained adherents of the time-tested principles of non-violence and interracial unity.

Yet it is not enough to condemn a new concept nor to be complacent because its appeal is narrow. The new mood has arisen from real, not imaginary causes. The mood expresses an angry frustration which is not limited to the few who use it to justify violence. Millions of Negroes are frustrated and angered because extravagant promises made less than a year ago are a shattered mockery today. When the 1965 voting rights law was signed it was proclaimed as the dawn of freedom and the open door to opportunity. What was minimally required under the law was the appointment of hundreds of registrars and thousands of Federal marshals to inhibit southern terror. Instead, fewer than forty registrars were appointed and not a single Federal law officer capable of making an arrest was sent into the south. As a consequence the old way of life — economic coercion, terrorism, murder and inhuman contempt — continued unabated.

In the northern ghettos, unemployment, housing discrimination and slum schools constituted a towering torture chamber to mock the Negro who tries to hope. There have been accomplishments and some material gain. But these beginnings have revealed how far we have yet to go. The inconsistencies, resistance and faintheartedness of those in power give desperate Negroes the feeling that a real solution is hopelessly distant. Many Negroes have given up faith in the white majority because "white power" with total control has left them emptyhanded.

Surrounded by an historic prosperity in the white society, taunted by empty promises, humiliated and deprived by the filth and decay of his ghetto home, some Negroes find violence alluring. They have convinced themselves that it is the only method to shock and pressure the white majority to come to terms with an evil of staggering proportions.

turn to the disciplined ranks of nonviolent direct action. The "Black Power" slogan comes not from a sense of strength but from a feeling of weakness and desperation. It will vanish when Negroes are effectively organized and supported by self-confidence.

They then move to an equally fallacious position urging that the poor Negro turn against the "middle class" Negro. This mutual fostering of disunity is the road to disaster for all.

There may be no means of obviating all riots everywhere this summer. SCLC has, however, offered a constructive lesson in its recent actions. We, with others, were daring enough to march through Mississippi to give disciplined expression to burning indignation. In the face of cries of black power we helped to summon 60,000 Negroes in the sweltering slums of Chicago to assemble nonviolently for protest — and they responded magnificently. The burden now shifts to the municipal, state and Federal authorities and all men in seats of power. If they continue to use our nonviolence as a cushion for complacency, the wrath of those suffering a long train of abuses will rise. The consequence can well be unmanageable and persisting social disorder and moral disaster. How ironic it is that in Chicago, four days of rioting were precipitated by the shutting of water hydrants: the authorities then found $10,000 for portable pools but meanwhile the State was spending $100,000 per day for the National Guard. America will have to see that the opulent life of so many of its people cannot exist in tranquility if other millions still languish in bitter poverty and hopelessness.

Negroes can still march down the path of nonviolence and interracial amity if white America will meet them with honest determination to rid society of its inequality and inhumanity. Negroes have to acquire a share of power so that they can act in their own interests as an independent social force — so that they can develop in responsibility by learning the proper uses of power. The majority of Negroes want to share power to bring about a community in which neither power nor dignity will be colored black or white. They seek a community of justice and security so that their children will be able to identify with the American dream as equals and not through the bars of a grim slum prison. SCLC will continue its principled quest to make these goals a reality.

CARMICHAEL MAPS BLACK UNITY MOVE

Militant Negro Student Will Meet With Muslim Leader

By AUSTIN C. WEHRWEIN
Special to The New York Times

EVANSTON, Ill., July 28—Stokely Carmichael, national chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, said today his organization would "join hands" with the Black Muslim leader, Elijah Muhammad, and with the Revolutionary Action Movement.

The purpose would be to define a common philosophy on the controversial phrase "black power," Mr. Carmichael indicated. The second organization, usually called "R.A.M.," has been linked to the Castro regime in Cuba.

The young Negro leader said that he had exchanged letters with Mr. Muhammad and that they would "meet later."

At his headquarters here, Mr. Muhammad said that he could only comment that a meeting was scheduled for Aug. 28 in the International Amphitheatre.

Mr. Carmichael was in Chicago for the announced purpose of defining once again "black power," he charged in a series of appearances that it had been distorted by the white press. He is scheduled to go to Detroit tomorrow and to Washington the following day before returning to Atlanta.

Mr. Carmichael also spoke of meeting with the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and other civil rights leaders. This left unclear whether his meeting with the Black Muslims and R.A.M. would be separate or part of a general parley.

Yesterday he and Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Manhattan Democrat, announced that a national black power conference would be held in Washington over the Labor Day weekend. They issued a blanket invitation to all types of Negro organizations.

Yesterday he and Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Manhattan Democrat, announced that a national black power conference would be held in Washington over the Labor Day weekend. They issued a blanket invitation to all types of Negro organizations.

Defines 'Black Poer'

At a morning news conference in the office of a Nesro community organization, the Oakland Committee for Community Improvement, Mr. Carmichael issued this definition:

"Black power means that black people have to politically get together to organize themselves so that they can speak from a position of power and strength rather than a position of weakness."

At a public meeting of about 100 persons this afternoon in the Orrington Hotel in suburban Evanston, eh asserted that Negroes wanted the right to control the wealth and stores in the black ghetto.

The militant rights leader described teh recent street violence in Chicago, Cleveland, Omaha, New York and Delsewhere as "rebellion" rather than "riot."

"I am not opposed to violence," the 25-year-old Negro declared.

He added that although he did not advocate violence, the blame for "rebellion" was to be laid at the "barricades white society refuses to move."

View on Bombing

Asked whether he condoned fire bombing tactics, such as used in Negro protests in Cleveland, Mr. Carmichael replied:

"It is not for me to condone. Or it is not for me to condemn."

After observing that the decision on what to do had been made by the people in the neighborhood involved, he said:

"If they are willing to face the consequences of their act, I am for them."

He was applauded when he said that if there had been a national conspiracy, Negroes would have "got a lot more out of the rebellion."

This was in reply to a query on whether he agreed with Senator Frank J. Lausche, Democrat of Ohio, who charged yesterday in Chicago that recent rioting and looting was part of "a national conspiracy executed by experts."

After the Evanston meeting Mr. Carmichael was asked his reaction to those contributors, mostly white presumably, who have withheld support from S.N.C.C. since the black power began.

"This speaks to the racism of people," he replied.

The direction Mr. Carmichael wants his group to take appeared from his comments here today to be first toward a sharp definition of what he termed "who our friends are."

"REVOLUTIONARY DEVELOPMENT," VIET NAM PACIFICATION VENTURE, RAISES SOME SERIOUS DOUBTS

by RICHARD DUDMAN

(The following article appeared in the St Louis Post-Dispatch as the third of a five-part series. The author had just returned from a two-month assignment in Vietnam. He gives an interesting analysis of one more attempt to secure the support of the South Vietnamese peasants for the Saigon government.)

"REVOLUTIONARY DEVELOPMENT," the latest pacification program in Viet Nam, has received heavy promotion and has stirred great expectations, but its test of performance still lies ahead. The prospects appear to be only marginal.

This "other war" was given a strong sendoff by President Lyndon B. Johnson when he told the South Vietnamese leaders at Honolulu that he was "determined to not only achieve a victory over aggression, but to win a victory over hunger, disease, and over despair."

So far, the chief result of the Honolulu meeting has been a political crisis that paralyzed much of the pacifying and military effort for three months.

But so much money and importance have been given to this program that there has been some bureaucratic scrambling between officials of the Embassy and the Agency for International Development, the Central Intelligence Agency and the Information Service, each trying to get a big piece of it. In a place where careers can easily be destroyed, there is a feeling that reputations can be made in the Revolutionary Development business.

ON PAPER, the new program shows great promise and is a big improvement over the old "strategic hamlets" and the various other plans for organizing the population and ferreting out the Viet Cong.

The new plan calls for a combination of self-defense, good government, economic aid, welfare assistante and commodities control to cut off support to the insurgency.

The first 90-day class with 4800 cadres finished training a month ago at a special school of Vietnamese officers assisted by the CIA at Vung Tao. Plans call for training 20,000 this year and eventually 150,000 of these pacification agents.

They learn the techniques of para-military defense and rural organization as well as such political tricks as how to spread rumors, how to set up demonstrations, and how to counter an anti-government or anti-American demonstration when, for example, a friendly village has been accidentally bombed.

PERHAPS the most important part of the course is an effort to implant patriotism hurriedly. This political motivation training includes drills in Vietnamese slogans, songs and in the history of the nation's heroes. Discussion groups cover French colonialism, the history of the Diem regime, past government errors, third-country assistance, and the reason for United States intervention.

(Group leaders describe the United States and South Viet Nam as two houses in the same village. The South Vietnamese house has caught on fire. If the fire spreads, the American house will burn, too. So the United States helps to put out the fire now.)

CHRISTIAN FAITH AND THE PROBLEM OF WAR

by GEORGE BLAU

War has always posed a problem for Christians who wished to be loyal citizens of thier countries and loyal to their Christian convictions. War has always been seen by Christians as evil, but there have been two basic historical positions Christians have taken toward war. Neither position allows a Christian to serve in the military simply because his nation is at war. Both positions require the individual Christian to face the moral aspects and implications of war in general, or of particular wars.

THE PACIFIST POSITION

Apparently the earliest Christian position toward war was pacifism: the total objection to military service on conscientious grounds. There is no evidence of Christians in the Roman army prior to approximately 200 A. D. One reason was that most hristians, being either slaves or considered by the authorities as Jews, were not eligible for military service. Another reason may have been the military oath of allegiance which was seen as placing loyalty to the emperor above loyalty to God. Such an allegiance would be blasphemy. A third reason was the seriousness with which the early Christians Jesus' sayings: do not kill, do not hate, love your enemies, do not resist evil with evil but with good.

Justin Martyr (100-165) was apparently the first Christian writer to make a specific reference to war:

> "We who once killed one another not only do not wage war against our enemies, but, in order to avoid lying or deceiving our examiners, we even meet death cheerfully, confessing Christ. And we who delighted in war, in the slaughter of one another, and in every other kind of iniquity have in every part of the world converted our weapons of war into impliments of peace."

Other early writers who with varying degrees of lucidity and emphasis considered war as organized iniquity with which the Church and the followers of Christ could have nothing to do were: Tatian (c. 160),, Irenaeus (130-202), Tertullian (160-220), Origen (185-254) Anhananasius (296-372), Cyprian (200-258), and Lactantius (250-325).

It was not too long before there were indications that Christians were accomadating with secular culture. Tertullian reports Christians in the army of Marcus Aurelius in 197. Tertullian disapproved of military service from the beginning of his literary career. He reported that some military personeel resigned from military service upon conversion to Christianity with the comment "Christ in disarming Peter unbelted every soldier." Also there was some indication that Christians who were in the army were not allowed to participate in the Lord's Supper (Eucharist) until having done penitence for shedding blood. In 248, Origen wrote "we do not fight under the emperor, although he requires it.

Today pacifism is the minority view among Christians, but it is a position respected by united State"s law through selective Service classifications 1 -O and 1 - A - O

THE "JUST WAR" DOCTRINE

It took some years for military service to be generally and

It took some years for military services to be generally and officially approved by the Church. Ambrose (340-97) was the first Christian writer to specifically approve of Christians participating in wars. Using the Old Testament and the Roman philosopher Cicero, Ambrose began the Christianized doctrine of the just war. Augustine (354-430) expanded the doctrine using both Cicero and Plato for justification. The doctrine continued developing through Thomas Aquinas (1227-1274) and was taken into Protestantism. It remains the majority view toward war by both Catholics and Protestants.

The "just war" did not allow anyone to serve under any circumstances. The clergy was eliminated from military service as pagan priests had been, and as they are under today's Selective Service Act. Standards were set by which a war was to be evaluated, to determine if it was a "just" war:

1. Only one side of the conflict can be just, and if the Christian's own nation was not the just side, he should refuse to participate.
2. The war must be declared, by lawful authority, following the legal process of declaring war, and any international agreements must not be violated.
3. The "just war" can be only undertaken for vindication of an undoubted and proportionate right that has been certainly infringed. If there is a doubt, the Christian must refuse to serve.
4. The war must be a last resort after all peaceful means of settlement are sincerely tried in vain.
5. The good to be achieved shall outweigh the evils that war involves. Today some Christians are saying that nuclear war is an evil that outweighs any possible good result in war.
6. There must be reasonable hope of victory for justice, for a war undertaken in the face of certain failure is, however heroic, irrational and is therefore an indefensible loss of life.
7. There must be right intention, i.e., to right the wrong. To wage war to maintain a national prestige (face), influence, or to enlarge territory is not "right intention."
8. The methods of warfare must be legitimate, that is, in accord with international agreements, with our nature as rational human beings, and with the moral teachings of Christianity.
9. There must be no unnecessary violence. No killing or torturing of civilians or prisoners, no massacres, no such atrocities.
10. Reprisals must be proportionate, i.e., small injuries can not be vindicated through larger reprisals.
11. War cannot be waged as part of a scheme to convert the heathen enemies to Christianity.

One problem with the "just war" doctrine is that each side in a war always considers its cause as "just" and forms its propaganda to convince its citizens its actions are "just".

Today, there are a few Christians who have refused to serve or have spoken out against the United States participation with the war in Vietnam. However, the government does not recognize "just war objection" as legal.

HIROSHIMA DAY
PEACE WALK AND RALLY
To commemorate the victims of Hiroshima and to protest U.S. involvement in Vietnam

On August 6, 1945, a U.S. Air Force B-29 dropped the first live atom bomb on the Japanese city of Hiroshima. A hundred thousand people were killed by that one bomb, and tens of thousands who were not killed immediately sickened and died later. Many historians believe the Japanese were getting ready to negotiate when the bomb was dropped, spreading terror in Japan and throughout the world.

For many years people throughout the world have commemorated Hiroshima Day — August 6 — by demonstrating for peace.

We urge you to walk with us in repentance for the action of our nation on August 6, Hiroshima Day.

Today, 240,000 American soldiers are fighting in Vietnam. They are the only foreign soldiers fighting against Vietnamese soldiers. American planes are bombing Vietnamese farms, forests, and cities. They are the only planes of a foreign nation bombing the Vietnamese. The United States is getting more and more deeply involved in a war thousands of miles from our shores. This continued escalation of the war is using goods, money, and men that should be used to build a better America, rather than to destroy another land and people with whom we have no quarrel.

Americans in many cities will be expressing their opposition to the war in Vietnam on August 6, Hiroshima Day.

We urge you to walk with us in protest against American involvement in Vietnam.

VIETNAM AND THE WAR IN VIETAM

WHERE VIETNAM IS AND WHO LIVES THERE

Vietnam is a little country. Its land is only about as big as Georgia and Alabama combined. It has a small population. There are about 190 million people in the U.S. There are about 30 million people in Vietnam. Does it seem to you as if a little country like that could do much harm to a big country like ours?

Vietnam is a poor country. Most of the people in Vietnam are poor rice farmers. Most of the children do not go to school There are almost no hospitals, almost no automobiles, almost no factories. Does it seem to you as if a poor country like that ought to be frightening to a rich country like ours?

HOW VIETNAM IS DIVIDED

America is divided in many ways: between North and South, city and country, rich and poor, white and Negro. Vietnam is also divided in many ways.

Vietnam is divided into North and South. The government of North Vietnam is headed by a man named Ho Chi Minh (pronounced "hoe chee meen). He is a Communist because he believes that Communism is best for the Vietnamese. He believes in "Vietnam for the Vietnamese," in other words that there ought not to be any foreigners in Vietnam telling the Vietnamese how to run their country. The government of South Vietnam is run by an army general named General Ky (key). He believes American army officers and policemen should help to run South Vietnam.

Vietnam is divided into the many poor and the few rich. The poor people live in little villages, and before the war they used to elect their own village "elders" (something like neighborhood councils). Now the village chiefs are appointed by General Ky. They help General Ky, and they help the American army. The poor people don't like them.

The Vietnamese are divided into Buddhists and Catholics. Almost 80 percent of the Vietnamese are Buddhists--an old religion, much older than Christianity. Most of the people who are not Buddhists are Catholics. Most of the Catholics are rich, powerful people who helped the French when they ruled the country. The Buddhists don't like the Catholics, because the Catholics would like to run the government. They don't like the Communists, because they are afraid the Communists will take away their religion and their influence. Above all, the Buddhists don't like General Ky because he is trying to take away all their power and because he keeps a terrible war going.

The people in North Vietnam and South Vietnam have the same language, race, religion--and the same problems. Do you think Vietnam should be one country or two? Who do you think should be in the government in Vietnam?

THE WAR IN VIETNAM

American soldiers in Vietnam are fighting against a force called the Viet Cong. Some Viet Cong are North Vietnamese; some are South Vietnamese. Some are Communists; some are not Communists. The V-C want Vietnam to be united, and they want American soldiers to go home and let them solve their own problems.

The American army in Vietnam is helping General Ky. He doesn't want North and South Vietnam to be united. He doesn't want the villagers to elect their own elders. He does want us to fight a much, much bigger war and for a very long time.

Do you want to fight in this war? Pay taxes for this war? Send your husband, son, brother to this war?

Where is YOUR fight for freedom? In Vietnam? Or in Atlanta?

For more information, write to Box 9233, Atlanta.

These first cadres, organized into 59-man teams, now have begun moving into hamlets in relatively secure areas. Their task is to help the residents take up their own defense, root out any Viet Cong agents, govern themselves effectively and support the government in Saigon. After three to five months, when this job is supposed to be completed in the first group of hamlets-each team will move on to another hamlet and begin there again.

Subteams are assigned to organize community defense, handle political indoctrination and also get available public services from the government.

THE KEY to success is a six man census-grievance sub-team, which studies and reports on the economic level, political beliefs, religious affiliations, aspirations and complaints of every family in the hamlet. Information is gathered through a confidential interview every ten days with every person in the hamlet over 10 years old.

A tacit quid pro quo is the real significance of the census-grievance group. It serves as an intelligence unit. In return for protection, help, sympathy, and advice, the hamlet residents are expected to tell which of their neighbors are or might be working for the Viet Cong.

Subsequent investigations are intended to prevent mistakes, as when someone tagged as a Viet Cong agent actually is an undercover government agent or is accused falsely because of personal or factional malice.

DESPITE official enthusiasm for this new pacification effort in Viet Nam, serious doubts and reservations are expressed privately by some of the very same men most dedicated to trying to make it succeed.

The clamor that has surrounded the program is cause for some misgiving. Some of these officials urge that it be considered a 10-year effort, not a quick formula for victory.

"Don't ask us to show any results at all in the first two or more years," said one. "The time to begin to judge success or failure will be about four years from now.

"We'll have all kinds of problems at first. Some of the cadres will be terrible. Some of them will rape, loot, steal, extort and try to live like kings. Some will turn out to be Viet Cong agents, infiltrated in our program as provacateurs."

The wholesale nature of the program arouses some doubts also. An official asks, Where are we going to find 150,000 cadres when we are already short of administrators to run the government and even recruits for the army?"

THERE IS a question, also, whether this instant patriotism can be achieved among a mixture that includes former strategic hamlet cadres under the Diem regime and members of political and religious factions that often fear and distrust one another more than the Communists.

Political action teams in a number of the northernmost provinces have been drawn largely from the Viet Nam Quoc Dan Dang, a policital party that bitterly opposes the majority Buddhist movement there.

About all, there is a question of conflict between the pacification program and the changing nature of the military effort in Viet Nam.

The announced strategy line calls for military action to extend the area of government control gradually. Behind this widening security screen, the revolutionary development program is intended to proceed with the pacification attempt.

BUT the military effort is increasingly aimed at breaking the back of North Vietnamese and main force Viet Cong armies. Methods being used are increasingly "search and destroy" and "search and clear." The old concept of "clear and hold" is being postponed.

"The oil slick strategy" is pretty well down the drain," a briefing officer tells newly arrived correspondents. " It was all right when all we had was a few guerillas. Now, with all these northern troops coming in, the oil slick system isn't worth a damn."

The American combat commanders take pride in their growing offensive capability against enemy units, whenever they can be found. But they concede generally that territory cannot be held until the South Vietnamese forces are prepared to follow up with occupation of the ground. This has happened only rarely so far.

Apparent progress in the heavily populated area surrounding the Mekong delta, where ground fighting still is a South Vietnamese monopoly, is largely the result of local accommodations between Viet Cong and government commenders. Neither pushes the other too hard.

As a result, when a political action team starts to distribute blankets, rubber sandals or bulgar (parched, cracked) wheat in a hamlet, it sometimes is taken for granted that the Viet Cong agents will come in at night to demand half of the new supplies.

AS THE AIR WAR intensifies, United States forces rely more increasingly on bombs and artillery. Commanders concede that targets sometimes are selected on inaccurate or outdated intelligence, so that whatever Viet Cong were present have fled. Much of the artillery fire is a "harrassing and interdiction" fire, aimed merely at likely places of enemy travel and concentration, with the results unobserved. Much of the bombing and shelling is done simply at a request from Vietnamese commanders, with no independent American check on the validity of the targets.

A pattern is beginning to develop in which bombs and shells pound the countryside, civilians are encouraged and helped to move to the cities as refugees, and anybody left in an area is assumed to be hostile. When all resistance has been smashed, the idea is that the people will be transplanted back and helped, through revolutionaty development, along the road to pacification.

THE IMMEDIATE military objective has come to be -- kill the Viet Cong -- or, as a Vietnamese general kept shouting at a recent cocktail party, "zap the V. C.! zap the V. C.!"

Some of the men most deeply involved in making Revolutionary Development work consider that the military and pacification efforts are working at cross purposes. They believe that the mounting civilian casualties and the destruction of the social fabric in the countryside help the Viet Cong more than they can help build an effective non-Communist society.

One of the officials most widely respected as a pacification expert would like to see a prohibition on all artillery fire on unobserved targets and all bombing and shelling based merely on intelligence reports.

"Killing the Viet Cong is not the answer," he says. "the answer is to give Vietnam a government and an economy that will compete with the Viet Cong."

THREE G.I. 'S ARRESTED AND HELD AT FORT DIX TO PREVENT THEIR SPEAKING ON THEIR LEGAL CASE AGAINST THE VIETNAM WAR?

Three G.I. 's,formerly stationed at Fort Hood,Texas,and on leave in New York City were arrested July 7 just one half hour before they were to speak to a public meeting at Community Church to explain legal proceedings which they have instituted against the Veitnam war,which they consdider"illegal,immoral.and unjust." They were taken,two of them in handcuffs to Fort Dix New Jersey and are being held under tight restrictions.

The three are PFC James Johnson,20,Pvt.Dennis Mora,25,and Pvt.David Samas,20. They were drafted into the Army last December took basic training at Fort Hood and signal training at Fort Gordon, Georgia. They became friends in training and found that they all felt the war in Vietnam was wrong.

They completed the Signal School and were assigned to the 142nd Signal Battlion,2nd Armored Division,Fort Hood Texas. There they found they were under orders to go to Vietnam.

"Now all we had discussed and thought about was real. It was time for us to quit talking and decide. Go to Vietnam and ignore the truth or stand and fight for what we know is right."

They were given 30-day leaves before reporting toOakland Army Terminal in California for shipment toVietnam. They decided not to go to Vietnam and to make a case of it. They went to New York and contacted an Attorney to seek an injunction in Federal Court based on the illegality of the war. They contacted the Fifth Avenue Vietnam Peace Parade Committee,which had organized the anti war demonstration of 50,000 people last March,and asked for help.

On June 30 they held a news conference and announced that they were filing the injunction,that they would report to Oakland Army Terminal as ordered when their leave was up July 13,but that they would not go to Vietnam. They said:

"We have been told that many times we may face a Vietnamese woman or child and that we will have to kill them. We will never go there--to do that-- for Ky!..We have made our decision. We will not be a part of this unjust, immoral, and illegal war. We want no part of a war of extermination. We oppose the criminal waste of American lives and resources.We refuse to go to Vietnam."

They have been supported in their stand by leaders of the civil rights and by the entire anti-war movement. Stokeley Carmichael, Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and Lincoln Lynch,associate national director of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) appeared with them at the press conference to give support of their organizations.

Master Sergeant Donald Duncan,who spent 18 months in the Special Forces in Vietnam and who refused a commission and quit the Army because he had become convinced the war was wrong sent a message of support saying: "Your actions if properly motivated, take a strength greater than that required to go to Vietnam. To perservere will be an act of personal bravery far beyond the capabilities of most of us, certainly far beyond anything I have ever done."

A committee to aid the three soldiers in their case was formed called the Fort Hood Three Defense Committee, with prominent people across the country as sponsors.

After their announcement, though they were still on leave, attempts were made to intimidate them and even to bribe them to drop the case. Pvt. Samas's parents were contacted by police and told that if their son would drop the case, he would be given an Army discharge. Then, only thirty minutes before they were to speak on their case before a public meeting they were arrested.

Floyd B. McKissick, national director of CORE, declared that the arrests "were made explicitly to prevent these young men from exercising their First Ammendment right to freedom of speech and were reminiscent of 'police state tactics.' Recently in Baltimore at its National Convention, CORE went on record as being opposed to the Vietnam war and pledged to aid and support those who would not serve in Vietnam."

The officers of the Fifth Avenue Vietnam Peace Parade Committee, Rev. A.J. Muste, Dave Dellinger and Norma Becker, sent a telegram to the U.S. Attorney General and the Secretary of Defense saying: "The peace movement will continue to aid in every possible lawful way anyone, civilian, soldier, sailor or Marine, who opposes this illegal, immoral war. The young men in the armed services are entitled to know the truth about the war and to engage in discussions about it. Citizens are likewise entitled to communicate the truth about the war to servicemen and the peace movement is determined to exercise that right."

The anti-war movement, with hundreds of thousands of active participants across the country is backing the three soldiers now being held at Fort Dix. We defend their right to free speech, their right to their day in court, and their right not to participate in a war which they consider immoral and unjust.

HUNGER STRIKE FOR PEACE

Every day in Vietnam, 300 people will die for nothing. For neither napalm nor death will ever find for them the love and peace they need. Today they are the victims of a situation in which they have no control, as I am the victim of the knowledge of their situation in which I have no control either.

When they die, all the love and peace won can do them no good, but more violence can do something. It can bring together with the dead their brothers and sisters, but together in death, not in life. Today these 300 people will die for nothing, tomorrow they will die for even less.

For one year I have marched, I have demonstrated, I have picketed. For one year I had hoped that one could somehow help to generate enough feeling against the war that the war would be stopped, but then why does the escalation continue to grow as much as the feelings against it? Why, if the Administration wants peace, do they continue to kill the people whom peace will serve?

On Monday, June 27th, at 1 p.m. about ten people whom I know (some of whose names are on this page) and I will begin a hunger strike for peace in front of the White House. As this is an act of individuals on behalf of their own moral feelings, there will be no limit of time for anyone. All we ask of anyone is that they participate to the fullest extent of their concern and conscience, to take only water and to remain completely non-violent at all times.

We are not demanding that the President either stop the war or else we will starve to death. This is not a political ultimatum. We are begging with all of our selves that he stop the killing of 300 people a day for nothing. We will starve in sympathy for the needless murder of human beings, not in demand for political alternatives. This is an act of individuals on behalf of their own moral consciences. This is a plea for peace.

There comes a time in a person's life when he not only feels for other people, but also feels himself feeling and cannot bear any longer the needless reality of death and murder with his feelings of love and respect. When he is either compelled to act to the fullest of his own conscience or else be driven into insanity.

Behind the Hostile Press Campaign Unleashed by the Election of Stokely Carmichael

SNCC Does Not Wish to Become A New Version of the White Man's Burden

We hope white liberals will not be taken in by the press campaign against the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee since Stokely Carmichael succeeded John Lewis as national chairman. White sympathizers with the Negro have to keep several things in mind. One is that in any movement the leverage exerted by the moderates depends on the existence of an extremist fringe. The second is that a certain amount of black nationalism is inevitable among Negroes; they cannot reach equality without the restoration of pride in themselves as Negroes. The third is that this cannot be achieved unless they learn to fight for themselves, not just as wards of white men, no matter how sympathetic. SNCC is reacting against a new version of the White Man's Burden.

Fresh Approach to Southern Politics

No white man really knows what it is like to be shut into the ghetto. "The Negro," as Martin Luther King said in a vivid phrase on CBS Face The Nation May 29, "is still smothering in an air-tight cage of poverty in the midst of this very affluent society." For the white sympathizer, the struggle against the ghetto is an act of philanthropy; for the Negro, it is a battle to save himself, not just from poverty but from a corrosive self-contempt. The ghetto dweller distrusts the white SNCC worker. Mr. Carmichael's idea of recruiting black SNCC workers from Northern ghettoes is psychologically sound. His idea of using white SNCC workers to organize the Southern poor white to the point where joint action between white and black becomes possible opens fresh perspectives in Southern politics.

The wonderful white boys and girls who went South in the past few years helped to thaw out the Negro from political deep freeze. But now that the battle has shifted from the simpler symbolic acts of sitting at a segregated lunch counter or in a segregated waiting room to the harder and more complicated tasks of winning a real economic and social equality, the job will have to be done by Negroes themselves. These are not tasks for a summer adventure in between classes. They can only be accomplished if Negroes are mobilized to carry on for themselves. In such areas as the Black Belt, where the Negro is a majority, this means seeking majority rule and that means Negro majorities. Otherwise the Negro is at the mercy of a white minority. In Lowndes county, Alabama, for example, where the Negro third party, Black Panther movement, originated, the white Sheriff has deputized every white man over 21. To be a deputy is to have the right to carry a gun, and to have a kind of hunting license to shoot Negroes.

This is the background against which one must read Carmichael's statement, "We feel that integration is irrelevant; it is just a substitute for white supremacy. We have got to go after political power." He asked an audience in Washington last week-end, "How are you going to integrate a sharecropper making $3 a day with a plantation-owner making $20,000 a year?"

Some people were shocked by Mr. Carmichael's angry remark, "We want quality education, not integrated education." But here I believe he expresses the reaction of Southern Negroes to the bitter experience of integration. The Wall St. Journal (May 26) carried a story, "The Invisible Wall" on the ostracism and the humiliation visited on those few Negroes who have often literally risked their lives to get into white schools. Many are leaving. This frightened handful in white schools only distracts attention from the need for first rate education in the Negro schools. This is just as true in the North where the Negro schools are segregated by the flight to the suburbs. Only by improved schooling can the Negro be fitted to compete as an equal in a hostile white world. To dismiss this as Negro nationalism is neither fair nor perceptive.

Of course the main reason for the campaign against SNCC is the statement it issued refusing to take part in the White House Conference on Civil Rights which convened as we were going to press. "Our organization," it said, "is opposed to war in Vietnam and we cannot in good conscience meet with the chief policy maker of the Vietnam war to discuss human rights when he violates the human rights of colored people in Vietnam."

High Ratio of Negro Combat Troops

This speaks the unspoken thoughts of many Negroes. The war is an affront to them. The proportion of Negroes in combat troops Joseph Alsop reported May 25 was "running above 20 percent in the average infantry company" because Negro recruits, with a lower average of technical skills, are less likely to be assigned to one of the technical specialties." The ratio in combat units is thus almost twice the Negro's ratio to population. The same discrimination that deprived Negroes of education puts them into the front ranks of battle in a struggle supposedly to preserve abroad a democracy denied them at home. How can they be blamed if they, like so many Vietnamese, see this as another white man's war?

But the main point, as Dr. King expressed it on TV, is that the war is wasting the money and the energy which can alone rehabilitate the Negro and bring him fully into the American community. Dr. King sounded very radical when he said this would cost $10 billion a year for ten years. The Vietnamese war already costs more than that, and the price will rise as it escalates. Is it any wonder SNCC feels bitter?

Powel Urges Negroes to Work Toward 'Black Political Power'

MOVEMENT NYT 7/30/66

OKLAHOMA CITY, July 29 (AP)—Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan, urged Negroes today to develop "black political power" so they can share fully in community life.

"Whatever the percentage of black people is in a community, they must have at least that same percentage of jobs, appointments, judgeships and commissionerships," said Mr. Powell in a speech prepared for the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs.

Mr. Powell told the women to "shake off the mink coat mentality that has alienated some from the black masses."

"Put on your work clothes and organize the black women of this country into a force so mighty that nothing can stand between you and the righteousness of your cause," he added.

Contributions Urged

The Negro Congressman urged the women's clubs to contribute at least $50 each to two militant civil rights organizations—the Congress of Racial Equality and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"These two organizations represent the wave of the black future," he said. "They alone are inextricably intertwined with the destiny of the black masses."

Mr. Powell spoke scornfully of older civil rights organizations, attacked unidentified Negro leaders as mere tools of the whites, and singled out Secretary of Housing Robert C. Weaver for a special attack.

After saying he had asked Mr. Weaver, the first Negro to serve in the Cabinet, what could be done to improve housing in Harlem, Mr. Powell said:

"I have never even received the courtesy of a reply which points up one of the most severe problems black people have today — the noncolored black man in high positions in Government."

He also renewed his criticism of Senator A. S. Mike Monroney, Democrat of Oklahoma, whom he accused of racism yesterday for recommending splitting the House Education and Labor Committee, which Powell heads.

"Oklahoma could use some help from its senior Senator, Mr. Monroney, who seems more intent on depriving one black Congressman of his chairmanship than on helping the black people in his own state," Mr. Powell said.

Monroney Accuses Powell

WASHINGTON, July 29 (AP) — Senator A. S. Mike Monroney accused Representative Adam Clayton Powell today of resorting to "political blackmail" in efforts to prevent the splitting apart of Mr. Powell's House Education and Labor Committee.

Mr. Powell told a news conference yeterday that a recommendation by the Senate-House Committee on Congressional Organization to establish separate education committees in both houses stemmed from "racism, pure and simple."

Mr. Monroney, who heads the organization group, replied in a statement today that this was a "phony and preposterous charge." He said Mr. Powell's race had nothing to do with the joint committee's proposal for dividing the work on the committee.

"I am appalled at his overt threat to exercise political blackmail over those who support a constructive step forward in modernizing congressional procedures," the Senator declared. "This is sheer demagoguery and should be resented by all members of Congress."

DR. KING PRESSES DRIVE IN CHICAGO

MOVEMENT

Plans Real Estate Vigils—Meets With Carmichael

NYT 7/30/66

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, July 29—The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr, began a new drive today against housing segregation. He said his supporters would begin all-night vigils in real estate offices.

Dr. King, chairman of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said the demonstration would begin in the Gage Park neighborhood on Chicago's Southwest Side, where homes are not being made available to Negroes.

He said Negro families had been told there were no vacancies in the area while white families had been shown homes available for occupancy.

Dr. King told an audience in the New Friendship Baptist Church that there was a "wall in this city" behind which a million Negroes were kept in a ghetto "of race, poverty and human misery."

Behind this wall, he said, the Negro walks the street unemployed or underemployed and pays more for comparable housing than whites.

Dr. King met briefly yesterday with Stokely Carmichael, national chairman of the Student Nonviolent Co-ordinating Committee, who made several speeches in Chicago before moving on to Detroit last night.

A spokesman for Dr. King said Mr. Carmichael had invited him to attend the national rally called for in Washington over the Labor Day weekend by the student committee and Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Manhattan Democrat. The spokesman said Dr. King did not accept or decline the invitation but said he would discuss it with his board.

While in Chicago, Mr. Carmichael was closely guarded by two bodyguards who, he confirmed, were members of the Deacons for Defense and Justice, a militant group that started in Louisiana.

Mr. Carmichael wore the "uniform" of civil rights workers in the South — blue work shirt and blue denim pants and heavy work shoes. The Deacons were in expensive well-pressed dark suits and narrow brimmed dark straw hats that they wore at all times, inside and outside of buildings.

One of the Deacons, Edward L. Crawford, was asked if he had a gun with him. He replied: "The Deacons are an armed group."

Negro Truce Urged

Mr. Carmichael, a militant advocate of "black power," spoke before a cheering rally last night in the United Packinghouse Workers Union Hall on the South Side.

He urged Negroes to stop fighting among themselves, asserting that "the only nonviolence we need is nonviolence among ourselves." He said that "we've been shooting and cutting the wrong people."

He said the recent lootings, burnings and killings in Negro sections of major cities were the result of a "rebellion."

He urged his audience to adopt the doctrine of black power, saying that "we don't control anything in this country but what the white people say we may control."

Cries of "black power" arose among his listeners.

Mr. Carmichael said black power meant that Negroes would "control the economics and politics of our own community." He urged Negroes to form cooperatives and use the profits to benefit their community instead of buying from white merchants.

Whitney Young Says Attempt Must Be Made to Reach Ghetto 'Unreachables'

By M. S. HANDLER
Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, July 31—Whitney M. Young Jr., executive secretary of the National Urban League, told the opening session of the league's 59th annual convention that a major effort must be made to reach the "unreachables," the marginal and the alienated men and women who are emerging from the ghettos.

His analysis of the changing mood of the Northern urban ghettos reflected a growing sensitivity in the established civil rights organizations to the underground rumblings in the black ghettos.

While insisting that the number of Negroes who participated in this summer's riots represented only a small fraction of the Negro population, Mr. Young also suggested that more dangerous explosions might be in the offing if programs with more creativity and breadth are not undertaken in the near future.

Mr. Young further suggested a number of such programs. The first, entitled Operation Urban Survival, would place New York's projected World Trade Center in Harlem. It would put new industries and Government buildings in the Negro slum areas throught the United States.

Benefits Expected

Mr. Young pointed to the construction of the United Nations Headquarters and Lincoln Center in two areas that were once slums. He felt that a similar effort in the ghettos would have similar beneficial results.

The right leader, who returned last week from Vietnam, also suggested the creation of a special veterans bureau at the National Urban League Headquarters in New York. This, he said, could determine the skills and resettlement desires of Negro soldiers before their separation from the armed services.

He said that President Johnson and Cabinet members had reacted favorably to the suggestion, which would require the support of the Federal Government, the Veterans Administration, industry and labor.

The National Urban League is not a membership organization. Its offices in 76 cities are manned by professional staffs and volunteers. Its programs, supported by foundations, Federal Government departments and industry, are directed toward employment education, housing and general welfare.

Last year the league found jobs for about 8,000 Negroes. There are 12,000 currently engaged in the educational program.

In his description of the changing mood in the black ghettos Mr. Young said:

"The Urban League is committed to providing services needed by the impoverished urban masses, not the middle class, but the poor, whose frustrations threaten to explode like dynamite, or, worse, who have become apathetic and resigned to their fate.

"We are especially concerned with the young people, embittered before their time by the conditions in which they live. Miseducated by the schools, harassed by authority, rejected in their efforts to find work, these people represent a potential tinderbox.

"These are the young people we have got to reach with constructive programs which will channel their hostility to productive ends, or they will immolate themselves on the self destructive pyres of hate and bitterness.

"But we must not only cope with hostility and agression; we must cope with something far worse.

"Another type of individual, the marginal and alienated man, has resulted from the unbroken cycle of poverty and discriminateion. He has been rejected and despised, subject to a lifetime of abuse and indignity, set outside the bounds of the society, which imprisons and exploits him.

"He exists in spiritual isolation and physical wreckage. His problem is less his hostility and hate, then his apathy. He is of society. His apathy and despair results from a lifetime of hurt and relentless rejecteion.

'He no longer cares. He has ben referred to as unreachable.

"The Urban League must reach the unreachable.

Mr. Young said that slogans were not new in the Negro civil rights movement and that black power, like other slogans, would not solve the Negro problem.

The Urban League, Mr. Young said, was and is committed to biracial cooperation.

"We will not compromise our belief in the absolute necessity for such cooperation to the success of the movement—morally, philosophically and practically."

He accused the press and other news media of having seized upon the slogan black power when it was first used during the Meredith march in Mississippi and with having blown it out of proportion. "The national press and television," he charged, "went harass."

"Any phrase which means all things to all people becomes meaningless. Power is neither black nor white—it is the green of the dollar bill, the maroon of a text book and the gray of a pay envelope."

Pickets of three Negro groups appeared outside the Sheraton Hotel where more than 1,000 delegates and friends of the National Urban League were gathered.

One picket's sign read: "This Is The National Convention of the Uncle Toms." Other signs attacked Mr. Young personally for his trip to Vietnam and his report that the morale of the Negro troops there is good.

'Black Power' Redefined

AC 8/4/66 MOVEMENT

Stokely Carmichael's "black power" Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is doing its level best (or worst) to stir up some violence in Atlanta's Vine City slums.

Tuesday night it almost succeeded. A crowd led by Carmichael gathered in Vine City around a policeman who was issuing a traffic ticket to an Alabama SNCC worker. The charges: blocking an intersection and making an illegal turn.

As Carmichael's racists chanted "black power," more people gathered and then police reinforcements arrived. The traffic citation was served and the crowd dispersed. No one was jailed, and the SNCC worker is scheduled to appear in traffic court Aug. 17.

Yesterday SNCC workers were building up Tuesday night's incident as a great victory for "black power." It was nothing of the sort. If anything, it was a victory for Atlanta police who coolly controlled a tense and potentially explosive situation.

What the incident did do was serve notice that Carmichael is being anything but candid when he says that "black power" merely means organizing Negroes into a voting bloc to secure by peaceful means the rights and opportunities that are legally theirs. What Carmichael is trying to do is promote not "black power," but "SNCC power" or "Carmichael power" in a contest with responsible civil rights organizations. He showed Tuesday night that he will defy law and order to win this power, even to the extent of inciting others to violence.

Stokely Carmichael's strategy of divide and conquer is essentially a problem that addresses itself to the Negroes themselves. He is their problem, and when he charges that others—including this newspaper—are seeking to divide them in Vine City and elsewhere, they should recognize him as the power-hungry opportunist he is and deal with him accordingly.

MOVEMENT ae 8/4/66

'Told You So' or 'Made It So'?

I have written several times recently that the "black power" movement—as it is practiced if not as it is explained—is a great evil.

It is no less evil because those who preach it have been provoked into it by repression and disillusionment. An evil influence must be fought even though the evil-doer deserves compassion.

But it is important to understand why Snick and CORE people and unorganized ghetto Negroes have swallowed the bitter poison of black racism.

It is important to realize that whites piously clucking "I told you so" really should be saying "I made it so."

It is important to identify the guilt of politicians who created and nurtured and thrived on discrimination.

It is important to recognize that present-day campaign oratory about "federal intervention" and "destroying individual rights" is nothing but old racism, pure and simple. It is not a new wave of conservatism sweeping our land, but old currents of hatred.

The white South at least was honest enough to formalize its discrimination into law. Now that honesty has been removed by higher law, and we rapidly are learning Northern hypocrisy in its place: "They've got everything, and now they want more." . . ."I fight poverty; I work" . . . "The federal government has taken away my God-given rights" . . . "They'd rather live off welfare than work."

Would it surprise you to know that only a few years—only a few months—ago, some of today's noisy "black power" high priests were idealistic believers in a nonracial America? Yes, they really believed civil rights laws and the war on poverty would change things.

Well, they have been clubbed and jailed and shot at. Their friends have been murdered. Southern sheriffs and policemen and politicians—and yes, "respectable" businessmen and "refined" women—have made a holy crusade of making application of the new laws as hard and as onerous a task as possible.

Picture yourself in a small Mississippi town a few weeks ago. A Negro who had taken part in a peaceful protest meeting fainted from the heat. As he lay on the ground, he was surrounded by "good" white citizens, male and female, kicking at him and yelling "kill him."

This was a real incident, far more common than we like to realize, but less violent than some: He was allowed to leave alive.

Imagine seeing that scene repeated month after month, year after year. Imagine living in towns where not a single white person spoke to you any way but hostilely. And then ask yourself how long you could retain your faith in American law or the innate goodness of white people.

As I said, "black power" is no better because of all this. But many of those who protest the most must share the blame.

Dr. King and 3 Score Plan to Picket Johnson Wedding

8/6/66

By EDWARD C. BURKS

Plans of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee to stage a protest march to the White House tomorrow on Luci Baines Johnson's wedding day drew a sharp rebuke from four national Negro leaders yesterday.

A telegram accusing the student committee of "extremely poor taste" was addressed to its leader, Stokely Carmichael, by these Negro leaders:

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League.

The demonstration is to be against the war in Vietnam and will culminate with a march to the White House at 3 P.M. for a "silent protest," according to Lester Kinnie, assistant director of the student committee's Washington office.

A Sharp Reaction

The wedding reception for the President's daughter is scheduled to be under way at that time.

The central committee of the student group reacted sharply to the four Negro leaders, declaring in a return telegram, "You have displayed more backbone in defending Luci than you have shown for the millions of black people being brutalized every day in the United States." It added:

"You have displayed more backbone in defending Luci than you have shown for the colored people of Vietnam being napalmed by Luci's father."

The group spoke of "black soldiers being exterminated in Vietnam" and accused the four leaders of showing more concern for the President's daughter than for "black brothers engaged in acts of rebellion in our cities."

Dr. King and Mr. Wilkins have clashed recently with leaders of the student committee and with the Congress of Racial Equality, denouncing their "black power" slogan as suggesting racism.

Reply Called Acrid

Yesterday's answer by the S.N.C.C. central committee was one of its most acrid. It described President Johnson as "your boss" and accused him of having scheduled the wedding on the anniversary of the atomic bombing of Hiroshima to divert news coverage from Vietnam and from the remembrance "that this country murdered many in Hiroshima."

Lincoln Lynch, associate national director of CORE, said that his organization had no plans "to picket the wedding." But he said that selection of the Hiroshima anniversary date for the wedding was "in the worst possible taste, a cynical disregard for the sensitivity of the Japanese people."

The telegram of the four Negro leaders said:

"We believe the scheduled demonstration is politically untenable because the young woman and her groom who will be subjected to embarrassment are in no way responsible for the Vietnam war and have no control over the conduct of our nation. The protest demonstration then becomes a futile and unflattering exhibition of the egos of the demonstators with no practicable effect upon the objective, the ending of the war."

The wire went on to accuse Mr. Carmichael of implanting the idea in the minds of millions that the demonstration represented an action by the civil rights movement. He was asked to withdraw from participation.

S.N.C.C. and CORE will join a large number of groups in a "Hiroshima Day protest parade" here Saturday. A dozen separate marches are scheduled to feed into Times Square, and the paraders will move on to a rally at 48th Street and Park Avenue.

'Black Power' Idea Took Months Of Planning, Secret Report Says

CHICAGO—A position paper, written last winter by dissident members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating committee (SNICK) and still considered confidential, shows that the organization's new "Black Power" philosophy was the product of months of planning.

The document is the first detailed explanation of the thinking behind the "Black Power" concept to become available to the public.

It was used by the dissidents to reverse the student committee's policy on the role of whites in the civil rights movement.

"If we are to proceed toward liberation, we must cut ourselves off from the white people," the document says. "We must form our own institutions, credit unions, co-ops, political parties, write our own histories."

"Negoes would instinctively champion all-black teams if they opposed all-white or predominantly white teams," the paper says. "The same principle operates for the (civil rights) movement as it does for baseball: a mystique must be created whereby Negroes can identify with the movement."

The members who prepared the paper also said they expected to be accused of being "racist" but were prepared to give up white financial support because they felt such support would "entwine" them "in the tentacles of the white power complex that controls this country."

Because it was compiled by a committee with at least some divergent views, the paper is alternately conciliatory and angry toward whites, but all of those who joined in writing it concluded that whites should have at best only a minor role in civil rights activity or in political organization among Negroes.

Urban League Chief Deplores the Fight Over Black Power

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 4 — The National Urban League has taken a stand deploring the controversy over the term "black power" because it has diverted attention from the "more meaningful debate around the real problems of poverty and discrimination."

Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the league, issued a statement yesterday designed to put in perspective what black power means to his organization.

The league, he said, has "carefully refrained from becoming involved in the fruitless dispute over the value of a slogan which has not even yet been clearly defined by its originators.

"Rather, we will continue to devote ourselves to bettering the position of the Negro in the nation.

"We will continue through our unique structure to expand and develop positive programs of action, which bring jobs to the unemployed, housing to the dispossessed, education to the deprieved and necessary voter education to the disfranchised.

"In the final analyses these are the things in our American system which bring power to both black and white citizens —and dignity and pride to all."

The phrase black power was a sensitive one during the league's five-day convention, which ended today with business sessions at the Sheraton Hotel here.

Mr. Young reported that during the year the league placed more than 8,000 Negroes in jobs, and that more than 10,000 now were in training.

Referring to critics who have condemned the organization because it has not been militant enough, Mr. Young said, "Direct action means putting a man in a job."

Lindsley F. Kimball was reelected president of the league. New officers elected were Louis E. Martin of Washington, a vice president; Mrs. Theodore R. Poston of New York City, secretary, and Leslie N. Shaw of Los Angeles, assistant treasurer.

Negroes Rip SNCC And 'Black Power'

AC 8/6/66

The Summit Leadership Conference, representing the top ranks of Atlanta's Negro community, is expected to issue a scathing denunciation of the "black power" movement and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) Friday.

Details of the proclamation, in the works through most of the day and night Thursday, were being kept under wraps.

The Rev. Samuel Williams, chairman of the conference, said a press conference would be called "when it's ready. We haven't got it ready yet, and we're not going to say what it is until it is ready."

The action comes on the heels of a spreading rift between the more militant and more moderate Negro camps—with the "black power" enthusiasts of SNCC and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) being polarized to the left.

Thursday the split in the Negro front widened with these developments:

—SNCC emphatically rejected pleas from more moderate Negro leaders and announced it definitely intends to demonstrate Saturday at the wedding of President Lyndon B. Johnson's daughter.

—The National Urban League convention in Philadelphia parted company with SNCC and CORE on their position on the Viet Nam war and praised Negroes fighting there.

—A spokesman said SNCC Chairman Stokely Carmichael still plans to "explore the possibilities" of a coalition with the Black Muslims to "work together for the black community."

—And Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. said a recent Vine City incident in which a white Atlanta policeman was surrounded by Negroes chanting "black power" was "deliberate" and "premeditated."

Allen said, "It was apparent entrapment of the policeman to bring him into this neighborhood and bring about this condition."

The incident started when Officer B. C. Basham stopped a car for a traffic violation in Vine City and wrote out a citation. Allen's statement came after a conference with members of the Summit Leadership Conference.

Meanwhile, SNCC fired off a telegram in reply to one from Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young and Asa Phillip Randolph who had asked SNCC to call off the demonstration Saturday at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington.

The leaders argued that Luci Johnson and Pat Nugent have nothing to do with the government's policy in Viet Nam, strongly opposed by SNCC. The SNCC reply read in part:

"The 6th is the (anniversary of the) day that this country murdered many in Hiroshima. In addition we believe your bossman (Johnson) elected this date to avert news coverage of Viet Nam and Hiroshima.

"You have displayed more backbone in defending Luci Johnson than you have shown for our black soldiers being exterminated in Viet Nam today."

The members who prepared the paper also said they expected to be accused of being "racist" but were prepared to give up white financial support because they felt such support would "entwine" them "in the tentacles of the white power complex that controls this country."

Because it was compiled by a committee with at least some divergent views, the paper is alternately conciliatory and angry toward whites, but all of those who joined in writing it concluded that whites should have at best only a minor role in civil rights activity or in political organization among Negroes.

Although the student committee is not a mass membership organization and, thus, is the smallest of the major civil rights organizations, it has the largest force of full-time organizers in the movement. Its approximately 135 members are all full-time staff workers, many of them with four to six years in the movement and with widespread influence in both the movement and in Negro communities where they have worked.

Started Trends in Past

In the past, major policy shifts within the student committee have started trends throughout the movement.

The organization was, for example, the first to send civil rights "missionaries" into Southern communities to live with Negro residents. This policy has since become standard operating procedure for the Congress of Racial Equality and for the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

The "position paper" indicates that the policy shift that led to the "black power" philosophy came as a result of internal discussion within the student committee over the role of white workers within the organization.

Out of this, there developed among student committee members the feeling that they could organize Negroes more easily if they had an all-Negro organizing staff and appealed to Negroes to band themselves into all-black political and economic blocs.

Membership Persuaded

Using their position paper to popularize their views, the "black consciousness" advocates within the student committee succeeded in persuading the full membership to adopt a formal policy of excluding whites from

Excerpts From Paper on Which the 'Black Power' Philosophy is Based

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, Aug. 4—Following are excerpts from a position paper, written by members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, that serves as the basis for the organization's "black power" philosophy:

The myth that the Negro is somehow incapable of liberating himself, is lazy, etc., came out of the American experience. In the books that children read, whites are always "good" (good symbols are white), blacks are "evil" or seen as savages in movies, their language is referred to as a "dialect," and black people in this country are supposedly descended from savages.

Any white person who comes into the movement has these concepts in his mind about black people if only subconsciously. He cannot escape them because the whole society has geared his subconscious in that direction.

Miss America coming from Mississippi has a chance to represent all of America, but a black person from either Mississippi or New York will never represent America. So that white people coming into the movement cannot relate to the black experience, cannot relate to the word "black," cannot relate to the "nitty gritty," cannot relate to the experience that brought such a word into being, cannot relate to chitterlings, hog's head cheese, pig feet, hamhocks, and cannot relate to slavery, because these things are not a part of their experience. They also cannot relate to the black religious experience, nor to the black church unless, of course, this church has taken on white manifestations.

Stereotype Reinforced

Negroes in this country have never been allowed to organize themselves because of white interference. As a result of this, the stereotype has been reinforced that blacks cannot organize themselves. The white psychology that blacks have to be watched, also reinforces this stereotype. Blacks, in fact, feel intimidated by the presence of whites, because of their knowledge of the power that whites have over their lives. One white person can come into a meeting of black people and change the complexion of that meeting, whereas one black person would not change the complexion of that meeting unless he was an obvious Uncle Tom. People would immediately start talking about "brotherhood," "love," etc; race would not be discussed.

If people must express themselves freely, there has to be a climate in which they can do this. If blacks feel intimidated by whites, then they are not liable to vent ing of the blues to us who are manifestations of the songs themselves?

It must also be pointed out that on whatever level of contact that blacks and whites come together, that meeting or confrontation is not on the level of the blacks but always on the level of the whites. This only means that our everyday contact with whites is a reinforcement of the myth of white supremacy. Whites are the ones who must try to raise themselves to our humanistic level. We are not, after all, the ones who are responsible for a genocidal war in Vietnam; we are not the ones who are responsible for neocolonialism in Africa and Latin America; we are not the ones who held a people in animalistic bondage over 400 years. We reject the American dream as defined by white people and must work to construct an American reality defined by Afro-Americans.

One of the criticisms of white militants and radicals is that when we view the masses of white people we view the over-all reality of America, we view the racism, the bigotry, and the distortion of personality, we view man's inhumanity to man; we view in reality 180 million racists. The sensitive white intellectual and radical who is fighting to bring about change is conscious of this fact, but does not have the courage to admit this. When he admits this reality, then he must also admit his involvement because he is a part of the collective white America. It is only to the extent that he recognizes this that he will be able to change this reality.

Another concern is how does the white radical view the black community and how does he view the poor white community in terms of organizing. So far, we have found that most white radicals have sought to escape the horrible reality of America by going into the black community and attempting to organize black people while neglecting the organization of their own people's racist communities. How can one clean up someone else's yard when one's own yard is untidy? Again we feel that S.N.C.C. and the civil rights movement in general is in many aspects similar to the anticolonial situations in the African and Asian countries. We have the whites in the movement corresponding to the white civil servants and missionaries in the colonial countries who have worked with the colonial people for a long period of time and have developed a paternalistic attitude toward them. The reality of the colonial people taking over their own lives and controlling their own destiny must be faced. Having to move aside and letting this natural process of growth and development take place must be faced.

Process of Growth

These views should not be equated with outside influence or outside agitation but should be viewed as the natural process of growth and development within a movement; so that the move by the black militants and S.N.C.C. in this direction should be viewed as a turn toward self-determination.

It is very ironic and curious how aware whites in this country can champion anticolonialism in other countries in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, but when black people move toward similar goals of self-determination in this country they are viewed as racists and anti-white by these same progressive whites. In proceeding further, it can be said that this attitude derives from the overall point of view of the white psyche as it concerns the black people. This attitude stems from the era of the slave revolts when every white man was a potential deputy or sheriff or guardian of the state. Because when black people got together among themselves to work out their problems, it became a threat to white people, because such meetings were potential slave revolts.

It can be maintained that this attitude or way of thinking has perpetuated itself to this current period and that it is part of the psyche of white people in this country whatever their political persuasion might be. It is part of the white fear-guilt complex resulting from the slave revolts. There have been examples of whites who stated that they can deal with black fellows on an individual basis but become threatened or menaced by the presence of groups of blacks. It can be maintained that this attitude is held by the majority of progressive whites in this country.

Thorough Re-examination

A thorough re-examination must be made by black people concerning the contributions that we have made in shaping this country. If this re-examination and re-evaluation is not made, and black people are not given their proper due and respect, then the antagonisms and contradictions are going to become more and more glaring, more and more intense until a national explosion may result.

When people attempt to move from these conclusions it would be faulty reasoning to say they are ordered by racism, because, in this country and in the West, racism has functioned has a type of white nationalism when dealing with black people. We all know the habit that this has created throughout the world and particularly among nonwhite people in this country.

Therefore any re-evaluation that we must make will, for the most part, deal with identification. Who are black people, what are black people; what is their relationship to America and the world?

It must be repeated that the whole myth of "Negro citizenship," perpetuated by the white elite, has confused the thinking of radical and progressive blacks and whites in this country. The broad masses of black people react to American society in the same manner as colonial peoples react to the West in Africa, and Latin America, and had the same relationship—that of the colonized toward the colonizer.

EXPONENT OF BLACK POWER: Stokely Carmichael, shown here at meeting in Farmville, Va., has been described by observers of Negro nationalism as a new Malcolm X.

Black Power Prophet

Stokely Carmichael

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Aug. 4—Stokely Carmichael was 11 years old when his family moved from Port of Spain in his native Trinidad to Harlem in 1952. Something of the West Indies can still be seen in him. His fine-cut face is friendly and he carries his tall frame with a slump-shouldered grace suggesting that he does not take himself seriously. But America has shaped the public Stokely Carmichael as something quite different.

Man in the News

"In Trinidad," wrote Robert Penn Warren, the novelist, after interviewing Mr. Carmichael in 1964, "some 96 per cent of the population had been Negroes; all immediate authority — police, teachers, ministers, civil servants—all the storekeepers and entrepreneurs in general were Negro.

"The 4 per cent white population lived in 'mansions'," he continued, "but then many Negroes lived in 'mansions' too, and the question of exploitation of the black by the white had not occurred to the boy. In America all was different. Immediate authoritative quate. He began to read, especially Marx, and to associate with young Socialists.

He learned about white liberals through his friends of the upper set at Bronx Science. He told Mr. Warren of being invited to a party at the swank apartment of a white friend and of being introduced to the boy's mother.

"Well, his mother had a group of ladies there, and it was like I hit it off right away," Mr. Carmichael told the novelist. "She said: 'Oh, I've heard so much about you, you've got such a sense of humor, Jimmy is talking about you, you're such a good-looking boy, what teachers you have . . .' and on and on. Finally, when I yas leaving, the door was just about closed, his mother turned to the other ladies and said, "Oh, yes, we let Jimmy hang around with Negroes.' I didn't like that."

One of his first targets when he became chairman of the student committee in May was white liberals. "Liberalism is an extension of paternalism," he said. Most whites have now left the student committee.

As a teen-ager, he was, at first, opposed to the student sitting in the South that be

So what we have now (in S.N.C.C.) is a closed society. A clique. Black people cannot relate to S.N.C.C., because of its unrealistic, nonracial atmosphere; denying their experiences of America as a racist society. In contrast, S.C.L.C. [the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference] has a staff that at least maintains a black facade. The front office is virtually all-black, but nobody accuses S.C.L.C. of being racist.

If we are to proceed toward true liberation, we must cut ourselves off from white people. We must form our own institutions, credit unions, co-ops, political parties, write our own histories.

To proceed further, let us make some comparisons between the Black Movement of the (early) 1900's and the movement of the 1960's—the N.A.A.C.P. [the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People] with S.N.C.C. Whites subverted the Niagara movement [the forerunner of the N.A.A.C.P.] which, at the outset, was an all-black movement. The name of the new organization was also very revealing, in that it pre-supposed blacks have to be advanced to the level of whites. We are now aware that the N.A.A.C.P. has grown reactionary, is controlled by the black power structure itself, and stands as one of the mittee have started trends throughout the movement.

The organization was, for example, the first to send civil rights "missionaries" into Southern communities to live with Negro residents. This policy has since become standard operating procedure for the Congress of Racial Equality and for the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

The "position paper" indicates that the policy shift that led to the "black power" philosophy came as a result of internal discussion within the student committee over the role of white workers within the organization.

Out of this, there developed among student committee members the feeling that they could organize Negroes more easily if they had an all-Negro organizing staff and appealed to Negroes to band themselves into all-black political and economic blocs.

Membership Persuaded

Using their position paper to popularize their views, the "black consciousness" advocates within the student committee succeeded in persuading the full membership to adopt a formal policy of excluding whites from policy-making and organizational roles within the committee.

The formal vote came at a meeting near Nashville, Tenn., in May. It was the same meeting at which James Forman resigned as executive secretary of the student committee and John Lewis, the organization's chairman, was ousted in favor of Stokely Carmichael, who a month later popularized the "black power" chant during the civil rights march through Mississippi.

In a recent interview, Mr. Lewis said the views contained in the "position paper" were advanced at the meeting by Mr. Carmichael, Bill Ware, who heads the committee's organizational drive in Atlanta's slums, and several other committee members.

Along those who opposed the views set forth in the position paper, according to Mr. Lewis, were Charles Sherrod, who in 1961 be came one of the student committee's full time staff members.

Withdrew After Vote

Mr. Shrrod, who divides his time between the civil rights movement and the Union Theologi cal Seminary in New York, where he is a student, had planned to bring several white seminary students into southwestern Georgia this summer on a voter registration project.

When the student committee voted to exclude white workers, Mr. Lewis said, Mr. Sherrod withdrew from active participation in the student committee and is now carrying on his voter registration project without committee approval or support. Others within the student committee oppose the black power philosophy, Mr. Lewis said, but he declined to name them.

Mr. Lewis said, however, that Mr. Forman embraced the black power philosophy and the exclusion of white organizers from the student committee, and thus insured the popularity of the views expressed in the position paper.

'Most Influential'

"Jim Forman wasn't defeated for re-election," Mr. Lewis said, "he just decided to step into the background. He is still the most influential person in Snick (the student committee). He can tell them to do something, and they will do it. Or he can tell them not to do something, and they won't do it."

Mr. Lewis also said that Mr. Carmichael, as the new chairman of the student committee, became the chief spokesman for the views expressed in the position paper. Mr. Lewis noted that it was Mr. Carmichael who gave the views a formal label when he began shooting "Black power, black power" during the Mississippi march.

"There was a lot of discussion about the role of whites for several months before the Nashville meeting," Mr. Lewis said. He said some of its strongest support came from the committee's organizational projects in Philadelphia and Atlanta. But it was discussed, too, in every area of the country in which the student committee is active, Mr. Lewis said.

the black church unless, of course, this church has taken on white manifestations.

Stereotype Reinforced

Negroes in this country have never been allowed to organize themselves because of white interference. As a result of this, the stereotype has been reinforced that blacks cannot organize themselves. The white psychology that blacks have to be watched, also reinforces this stereotype. Blacks, in fact, feel intimidated by the presence of whites, because of their knowledge of the power that whites have over their lives. One white person can come into a meeting of black people and change the complexion of that meeting, whereas one black person would not change the complexion of that meeting unless he was an obvious Uncle Tom. People would immediately start talking about "brotherhood," "love," etc; race would not be discussed.

If people must express themselves freely, there has to be a climate in which they can do this. If blacks feel intimidated by whites, then they are not liable to vent the rage that they feel about whites in the presence of whites—especially not the black people whom we are trying to organize, i.e., the broad masses of black people. A climate has to be created whereby blacks can express themselves. The reason that whites must be excluded is not that one is anti-white, but because the efforts that one is trying to achieve cannot succeed because whites have an intimidating effect. Offtimes the intimidating effect is in direct proportion to the amount of degradation that black people have suffered at the hands of white people.

Role in Movement

It must be offered that white people who desire change in this country should go where that problem (of racism) is most manifest. The problem is not in the black community. The white people should go into white communities where the whites have created power for the express [purpose] of denying blacks human dignity and self-determination. Whites, who come into the black community with ideas of change seem to want to absolve the power structure of its responsibility of what it is doing, and saying that change can come only through black unity, which is only the worst kind of paternalism. This is not to say that whites have not had an important role in the movement. In the case of Mississippi, their role was very key in that they helped give blacks the right to organize, but that role is now over, and it should be.

People now have the right to picket, the right to give out leaflets, the right to vote, the right to demonstrate, the right to print.

These things which revolve around the right to organize have been accomplished mainly because of the entrance of white people into Mississippi, in the summer of '64. Since these goals have now been accomplished, their (whites') role in the movement has now ended. What does it mean if black people, once having the right to organize, are not allowed to organize themselves? It means that blacks' ideas about inferiority are being reinforced. Shouldn't people be able to organize themselves? Blacks should be given this right. Further (white participation) means in the eyes of the black community that whites are the "brains" behind the movement and blacks cannot function without whites. This only serves to perpetuate existing attitudes within the existing society, i.e., blacks are "dumb," "unable to take care of business," etc. Whites are "smart," the "brains" behind everything.

How do blacks relate to other blacks as such? How do we react to Willie Mays as against Mickey Mantle? What is our response to Mays hitting a home run against Mantle performing the same deed? One has to come to the conclusion that it is because of black participation in baseball. Negroes still identify with the Dodgers because of Jackie Robinson's efforts with the Dodgers. Negroes would instinctively champion all-black teams if they opposed all-white or predominantly white teams. The same principle operates for the movement as it does for baseball: a mystique must be created whereby Negroes can identify with the movement.

Thus an all-black project is needed in order for the people to free themselves. This has to exist from the beginning. This relates to what can be called "coalition politics." There is no doubt in our minds that some whites are just as disgusted with this system as we are. But it is meaningless to talk about coalition if there is no one to align ourselves with, because of the lack of organization in the white communities. There can be no talk of "hooking up" unless black people organize blacks and white people organize whites. If these conditions are met then perhaps at some later date—and if we are going in the same direction — talks about exchange of personnel, coalition, and other meaningful alliances can be discussed.

In the beginning of the movement, we had fallen into a trap whereby we thought that our problems revolved around the right to eat at certain lunch counters or the right to vote, or to organize our communities. We have seen, however, that the problem is much deeper. The problem of this country, as we had seen it, concerned all blacks and all whites (and therefore) if decisions were left to the young people, then solutions would be arrived at. But this negates the history of black people and whites. We have dealt stringently with the problem of "Uncle Tom," but we have not yet gotten around to Simon Legree. We must ask ourselves who is the real villain? Uncle Tom or Simon Legree? Everybody knows Uncle Tom but who knows Simon Legree? Christian Leadership Conference] has a staff that at least maintains a black facade. The front office is virtually all-black, but nobody accuses S.C.L.C. of being racist.

If we are to proceed toward true liberation, we must cut ourselves off from white people. We must form our own institutions, credit unions, co-ops, political parties, write our own histories.

To proceed further, let us make some comparisons between the Black Movement of the (early) 1900's and the movement of the 1960's—the N.A.A.C.P. [the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People] with S.N.C.C. Whites subverted the Niagara movement [the forerunner of the N.A.A.C.P.] which, at the outset, was an all-black movement. The name of the new organization was also very revealing, in that it pre-supposed blacks have to be advanced to the level of whites. We are now aware that the N.A.A.C.P. has grown reactionary, is controlled by the black power structure itself, and stands as one of the main roadblocks to black freedom. S.N.C.C., by allowing the whites to remain in the organization, can have its efforts subverted in the same manner, i.e., through having them play important roles such as community organizers, etc. Indigenous leadership cannot be built with whites in the positions they now hold.

These facts do not mean that whites cannot help. They can participate on a voluntary basis. We can contract work out to them, but in no way can they participate on a policy-making level.

The charge may be made that we are "racists," but whites who are sensitive to our problems will realize that we must determine our own destiny.

To Find a Solution

In an attempt to find a solution to our dilemma, we propose that our organization (S.N.C.C.) should be black-staffed, black-controlled and black-financed. We do not want to fall into a similar dilemma that other civil rights organizations have fallen. If we continue to rely upon white financial support we will find ourselves entwined in the tentacles of the white power complex that controls this country. It is also important that a black organization (devoid of cultism) be projected to our people so that it can be demonstrated that such organizations are viable.

More and more we see black people in this country being used as a tool of the white liberal establishment. Liberal whites have not begun to address themselves to the real problem of black people in this country; witness their bewilderment, fear and anxiety when nationalism is mentioned concerning black people. An analysis of their (white liberal) reaction to the word alone (nationalism) reveals a very meaningful attitude of whites of any ideological persuasion toward blacks in this country. It means previous solutions to black problems in this country have been made in the interests of those whites dealing with these problems and not in the best interests of black people in this country. Whites can only subvert our true search and struggle for self-determination, self-identification, and liberation in this country. Re-evaluation of the white and black roles must NOW take place so that whites no longer designate roles that black people play but rather black people define white people's roles.

Too long have we allowed white people to interpret the importance and meaning of the cultural aspects of our society. We have allowed them to tell us what was good about our Afro-American music, art and literature. How many black critics do we have on the "jazz" scene? How can a white person who is not a part of the black psyche (except in the oppressor's role) interpret the mean-

America. It is only to the extent that he recognizes this that he will be able to change this reality.

Another concern is how does the white radical view the black community and how does he view the poor white community in terms of organizing. So far, we have found that most white radicals have sought to escape the horrible reality of America by going into the black community and attempting to organize black people while neglecting the organization of their own people's racist communities. How overall point of view of the white psyche as it concerns the black people. This attitude stems from the era of the slave revolts when every white man was a potential deputy or sheriff or guardian of the state. Because when black people got together among themselves to work out their problems, it became a threat to white people, because such meetings were potential slave revolts.

It can be maintained that this attitude or way of thinking has perpetuated itself to this current period and that ple, what are black people; what is their relationship to America and the world?

It must be repeated that the whole myth of "Negro citizenship," perpetuated by the white elite, has confused the thinking of radical and progressive blacks and whites in this country. The broad masses of black people react to American society in the same manner as colonial peoples react to the West in Africa, and Latin America, and had the same relationship —that of the colonized toward the colonizer.

Man in the News

ly Carmichael was 11 years old when his family moved from Port of Spain in his native Trinidad to Harlem in 1952. Something of the West Indies can still be seen in him. His fine-cut face is friendly and he carries his tall frame with a slump-shouldered grace suggesting that he does not take himself seriously. But America has shaped the public Stokely Carmichael as something quite different.

"In Trinidad," wrote Robert Penn Warren, the novelist, after interviewing Mr. Carmichael in 1964, "some 96 per cent of the population had been Negroes; all immediate authority — police, teachers, ministers, civil servants—all the storekeepers and entrepreneurs in general were Negro.

"The 4 per cent white population lived in 'mansions'," he continued, "but then many Negroes lived in 'mansions' too, and the question of exploitation of the black by the white had not occurred to the boy. In America all was different. Immediate authority was white, and the storekeeper was white."

Molding of Youth

Fourteen years of accomodating to white authority in this country has molded him into the kind of Negro leader who could become the chief architect of "black power."

As the new chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, he has so successfully called attention to the growing spirit of black consciousness among American Negroes that some have begun to describe him as a new Malcolm X.

He played a leading role in the committee's decision to prepare a "position paper" on the new "black power" philosophy, which has been used to reverse its policy on whites in the rights movement.

Mr. Carmichael was born in Port of Spain June 21, 1941 to Adolphus and Lynette Carmichael. He became an American citizen by derivation after both parents had been naturalized. His mother and two younger sisters still live in the East Bronx. Mrs. Carmichael is a stewardess for a steamship line. The father died in 1962.

Mr. Carmichael's father was a carpenter who moonlighted as a taxi driver in New York. Seemingly attracted by the white middle class, the father moved his family from Harlem to an old Italian and Jewish neighborhood in the East Bronx, where they were the only Negroes.

Dividend Friendships

Young Stokely divided his friendships between the whites of the East Bronx and the Negroes he had known in Harlem. He went through a period of being ashamed of being a Negro.

In 1956, he became one of about 50 Negroes in the Bronx High School of Science. It was there that he discovered that his intellectual background had been inade-ciate with young Socialists.

He learned about white liberals through his friends of the upper set at Bronx Science. He told Mr. Warren of being invited to a party at the swank apartment of a white friend and of being introduced to the boy's mother.

"Well, his mother had a group of ladies there, and it was like I hit it off right away," Mr. Carmichael told the novelist. "She said: 'Oh, I've heard so much about you, you've got such a sense of humor, Jimmy is talking about you, you're such a good-looking boy, what teachers you have . . .' and on and on. Finally, when I yas leaving, the door was just about closed, his mother turned to the other ladies and said, "Oh, yes, we let Jimmy hang around with Negroes.' I didn't like that."

One of his first targets when he became chairman of the student committee in May was white liberals. "Liberalism is an extension of paternalism," he said. Most whites have now left the student committee.

As a teen-ager, he was, at first, opposed to the student sit-ins in the South that heralded a new stage in the civil rights movement in 1960. Then he met some youngsters who were involved in them. He joined a sit-in in Virginia and from then on was solidly in the movement.

Mr. Carmichael went to Howard University, from which he was graduated in 1964 with a degree in philosophy. At Howard, he drifted away from his intellectual fascination with Marxism and plunged into direct action.

He joined the Nonviolent Action Group, an affiliate of the newly formed Student Committee. He went on a freedom ride to Mississippi in 1961 and spent 49 days in the Mississippi state penitentary. By June of this year, he had already been jailed 27 times.

He helped to organize the first "Black Panther" political party in Mississippi, based on 1,600 Negroes who registered to vote for the first time.

In the South, his speech lost some of its Caribbean-New York clip and become almost a drawl. He learned to say "He don't" and "he have" to improve communication with field hands. He has practically abandoned city dress and adopted overalls and blue jeans.

During the last few months, he has become more militant in this public utterances. While preaching black pride and black power, he has become increasingly cool toward whites.

He recently addressed a racially mixed audience here and, with several whites of long acquaintance in the room, declared that he had never known a white person he could trust.

A young white man who had considered himself Mr. Carmichael's friend rose from the audience.

"Not one, Stokely?" he asked.

Mr. Carmichael looked directly into his eyes and replied, "No—not one."

The Politics of Frustration

The statement on "black power" written by members of The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee from which The Times printed sizable excerpts last Friday is at once a poignant and mischievous document.

It provides an intellectual context for the inflammatory statements made in recent days by Stokely Carmichael, the national chairman of SNCC. He has urged Negro youths not to fight in Vietnam, called upon Negroes to stop begging and start taking what belongs to them and declared: "We have got to bring the whites to their knees."

Regardless of other interpretations that could reasonably be offered of the term "black power," Mr. Carmichael and his SNCC associates clearly intended to mean Negro nationalism and separatism along racial lines—a hopeless, futile, destructive course expressive merely of a sense of black impotence. As a practical program, it has nothing more to recommend it than the wretched violence that some Chicago whites have been using in recent days against the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King and his Negro followers.

The SNCC background paper is very much a young man's statement. The authors express a yearning for identity and status that seems as much personal as racial. There is almost no recognition of the ambiguities and indefiniteness of real life.

It cries out that "whites (should) no longer designate roles that black people play but rather black people define white people's roles." What individuals of every race eventually discover is that one's role in life is established by a complex interplay between one's own desires and objective circumstances.

The SNCC paper and Mr. Carmichael's public statements amply demonstrate the growing desperation and disorganization of the radical wing of the civil rights movement. The SNCC leaders, like their counterparts in the Congress of Racial Equality and other smaller, less well-known organizations, are essentially barricade types. They are romantics and would-be revolutionaries for whom the greatest triumph is lying down in the street in protest or getting arrested by a Southern sheriff. In past years the civil rights movement could make good use of their gallantry and reckless daring. But the tactics of direct protest have achieved about all such tactics could. When lunch counters even in small Southern towns are desegregated, the willingness to risk physical injury in a lunch counter sit-in—valuable as that once was—is no longer of much importance.

The civil rights movement in recent years has gradually been moving, in the words of Bayard Rustin, from "protest to politics." Effective politics for Negroes, as for any other group, means bringing pressure to bear at the right times and places and taking part in shifting alliances with other groups.

A statement by a national committee of Negro churchmen printed in The Times a week ago put the matter well: "Power today is essentially organizational power. It is not a thing lying about in the streets to be fought over. It is a thing which, in some measure, already belongs to Negroes and which must be developed by Negroes in relationship with the great resources of this nation."

But most of the militants who make up SNCC and CORE have no taste or talent for the arduous practice of sophisticated politics. They are taking refuge from the hard fact of the dwindling effectiveness of direct action by escaping into black nationalism. This political escapism is as sure to fail as Marcus Garvey's comparable "back to Africa" movement in the 1920's.

There is widespread injustice and misery in the Negro ghettos of the North and therefore high potential for disorder. But Stokely Carmichael has to be seen in perspective as a product of that injustice and not as a leader who can help his fellow Negroes work their way out of it. Only Negro leaders and organizations that understand what politics and power really are can do that.

Rationale for Civil Disorder?

AC 8/15/66

There continues to be a gap between "Black Power" as it is explained and as it is understood and practiced. The high priest of the movement, Snick's Stokely Carmichael, has abandoned all pretense of its innocence. In Cleveland, Ohio, he said Black Power meant "building a movement that will smash everything Western civilization has created" and "bringing this country to its knees."

This, and not the simple political organization, is the meaning understood by mobs of rioters, looters and brawlers. Black power is essentially an emotional appeal, rather than intellectual.

Yet there can be a rationale even for the irrational. As the history of revolutions reveals, terror and disorder can have utility for the insurgents.

Julian Bond, Snick official and unseated Georgia legislator, spoke about Black Power to a group of Africans visiting here last month. His talk, as summarized later by Mr. Bond himself, contained internal contradictions: On the one hand it gave the conservative definition of Black Power as organization of Negro voting strength; on the other, it gave a rationale for civil disorder.

But the most valuable part of the speech, it seems to me, is Mr. Bond's list of assumptions on which Black Power rests. Here are some of them:

". . . the social system, as organized, is no longer capable of solving, through normal channels, the urgent problems presented to it by history.

". . . white Americans, generally speaking, lack the will, the courage and the intelligence to voluntarily grant Negroes their civil rights and . . . must be forced to it by pressure.

". . . people do not discriminate for the fun of it; . . . the function of prejudice is to defend social, economic, political and psychological interests, and . . . appeals to the fair play of prejudiced people are prayers said to the wind.

". . . communities will change discriminatory patterns if they are faced with a clear-cut choice between bias and another highly developed value—economic gain, education or civic peace."

Mr. Bond is on well researched ground when he speaks of the "function" of prejudice. Likewise, it has been demonstrated that many or most segregationists hold other values higher than segregation itself.

But what of the other points? Is the social system incapable of solving today's problems? Are the majority of white Americans unwilling or unable to grant Negroes justice?

I for one say "no" to both questions. And it seems to me that Black Power agitation itself makes it more difficult for the social system to function properly and for whites to be more just.

But the evidence is not all reassuring. From Jim Clarks and lynch mobs in the South to hesitation in Congress to snarling white suburban crowds in the North, there is much to support Mr. Bond's position rather than mine. If he is right, Armageddon is around the corner.—BRUCE GALPHIN.

3 Rights Workers Sought in Dynamite Discovery

Fourth Suspect Surrenders to Police in Philadelphia

By JACQUES NEVARD
Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 14—Three men described as officials of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee were sought today on charges stemming from the discovery of dynamite in the local headquarters of the militant civil rights organization.

A fourth man, alleged to have taken nine sticks of dynamite to the headquarters, surrendered to the Philadelphia police today. The police, in addition to seeking the three other men, were also searching for four missing sticks of dynamite.

Warrents charging illegal possession of explosives and conspiracy were issued last night for Winston Ealy, 23 years old, who surrendered today; and Fred Meely, 27, regional director of the student committee; Morris Ruffin, 25, a project director of the group, and George Anderson, 21, a full-time field worker.

There was no indication that authorities had discovered how the dynamite was to be used. Asked about this, Acting Police Commissioner Frank L. Rizzo said:

"For me to say would be mere supposition, but I'm sure they weren't going into the construction business."

5 Sticks Recovered

Local authorities have recovered five sticks of dynamite. Two and a half sticks were brought into police headquarters last Friday by an informant to back up his story that arms caches were being built up at four Philadelphia apartments used by regional officials of the student committee, known as "Snick," and other civil rights groups.

Two and a half more sticks were found at one of those apartments early Saturday morning when a large police raid was carried out. Eighty heavily armed policemen in four squads of 20 men each raided the suspected apartments, in predominantly Negro areas, while 1,000 additional policeman stood by outside the buildings.

There were no disturbances even when the police arrested three men and a young woman at the two-story apartment building on 16th Street near Poplar where the dynamite was found.

Four Held in Jail

Commissioner Rizzo has disclosed that the search for Mr. Ealy and the three still missing men was started on information supplied by Barry Dawson, 19, one of the four persons arrested yesterday.

Associated Press

Cecil B. Moore, head of the N.A.A.C.P. in Philadelphia, deplored any dynamite that might be "lying around."

Missing Men Are Identified as Officials of 'Snick'

Mr. Dawson has been identified as a member of "Snick" but the three others arrested with him have been described by the police as members of the Young Militants, a Philadelphia group of about 30 persons who advocate black supremacy. They were George Brown, 28; Eugene Dawkins, 19, and Miss Carol West, 18.

All four were being held in jail in default of bail, which was set at $50,000 each. Common Pleas Judge Leo Weinrott has scheduled a hearing for Aug. 22.

Police officials said that Mr. Ealy was not a member of any civil rights group but was "very friendly" with a number of persons in the student committee. The police said Mr. Ealy had told them he had obtained the dynamite at a construction site and had helped his friends take it to the committee's headquarters, where, after first being shifted to the basement it was divided among several members.

The police have reported finding evidence that still another small regional civil rights group, the Northern Students Movement, used at least one of the raided apartments. But officials said no members of the organization had been identified with the dynamite thus far.

Officials said that the largest and most influential civil rights organization in Philadelphia, the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was in no way identified with any of the sought or arrested persons, or with the raided apartments.

The question had arisen when Cecil B. Moore, president of the Philadelphia branch of the N.A.A.C.P., appeared as lawyer for the four persons arrested yesterday and more recently for Mr. Ealy.

LONDON (UPI)—The Student Non - Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) will help prepare evidence for the "war crimes tribunal" which aged British philosopher Lord Bertrand Russell plans to hold in Paris, the Bertrand Russell Peace Foundation announced Tuesday.

A spokesman for the Communist - line foundation said members of SNCC, under leadership of national chairman Stokely Carmichael, will go to North Viet Nam as part of the international investigating committee gathering evidence with which to "indict" President Lyndon B. Johnson "and other war criminals responsible for American atrocities in Viet Nam."

By DR. JAMES P. SHENTON

Professor of History, Columbia University
Written for The Associated Press

Few words are more bandied about than the word "revolution." It is used to describe such fundamental political and social upheavals as the French, Russian, Mexican, Chinese, and Cuban revolutions.

The term "industrial revolution" is used to describe the vast economic and social changes precipitated by technological development during the 18th and 19th centuries.

Dr. James Shenton

The alterations of teenage behavior and of sexual mores have been labeled revolutions. The range of usage has resulted in revolution as describing basic structural changes in society as well as the ephemeral alterations which occur in popular behavior.

Since the U.S. Supreme Court in 1954 struck down the "separate but equal" doctrine when it delivered the Brown vs. Board of Education of Topeka decision, black Americans have been involved in a steadily escalating struggle to undo segregation and discrimination.

Americans have generally become aware that they are in the midst of a "black revolution." What began as a struggle to integrate education has grown to include political equality, full access to public accommodation, and to an improvement of their living conditions.

Most recently, it has taken a new direction with the cry for "black power." Throughout the struggle, the Negro has received large help from the white community. But the absence of a well defined meaning to "black power" has created confusion in the ranks of civil rights supporters and evoked fears among many previously friendly whites. The riots which have rocked Watts, Harlem, Paterson, N.J., Chicago and Cleveland have not only accentuated white fears but also triggered a white backlash.

THE QUESTION is increasingly raised of whether the moderate Negro leadership is giving way to a more radical element. The civil rights program which heretofore has emphasized equality and integration is now blurred by the cries to "get whitey" and the demand to bring the white American to his knees.

Has the black revolution entered a new phase where terror will replace reason? Is it moving in the direction of the great revolutions that shook Great Britain in the 17th century, America and France in the 18th century, and Mexico, Russia, China and Cuba in the 20th century?

Any answer to these questions must be predicated with a warning: The black revolution is incomplete; to draw too rigid parallels with past revolutions is to deny it its unique characteristics.

Furthermore, the American, French and Russian revolutions with which it will be compared involved the aspirations of a whole people, while the black revolution is the struggle of a minority to claim coequality with a privileged white majority. But even with these qualifications, some parallels can be drawn.

Violence alone is not sufficient proof of a revolution.

It is only when an upswing of violence occurs which normal police authority cannot contain that the description revloutionary is applicable.

In the American revolutionary period, rioting erupted time and again between 1765 and 1775, usually in response to efforts by London to extend its authority. After each outbreak, George III's government had to back away from its effort to extend its authority, revealing its incapacity to assert effective control over the colonies. Governmental retreat reinforced the colonial determination to secure their interests and rights.

WHEN LONDON finally responded to the Boston Tea Party with the Intolerable Acts, they triggered a revolution.

The colonials were not ready to relinquish the system of local eyes of the men who made the American revolution, they were conservatives defending an established order against the claims of a near-alien authority.

Unlike the Americans, the French under the Bourbon crown had no representative bodies through which to articulate their discontent. But like the Americans, the French preparation for revolution was gradual. When it finally exploded, the objective of the French was not to preserve but to overturn the old order. Though in theory Louis XVI possessed absoluute power, in fact, it was an illusion.

The same process of long sustained crisis characterized Russia in the decades preceding the revolution. Denied legitimate outlets for protest, opponents of tsarism resorted to assassination and underground terrorism. The Tsar responded with ever more stringent suppression. It took two wars —with Japan and World War I—to expose both the depth of popular alienation and the decrepitude of the tsarist system. The result was the collapse between March 8 and 16, 1917, of the Romanov dynasty.

MARTIN LUTHER KING (C) PRAYS IN MISSISSIPPI
Moderate Negro Leadership May Lose Out to Radicals

In all three revolutions, the coming upheaval was not unexpected; established authority had ample warning. But in each instance, the ruling government failed to understand the need for fundamental change. None had the remotest sense of how alienated from them were the governed.

ALL WERE INVOLVED in a severe crisis. Britain sought to reduce the tax burden at home by shifting some of it to the colonials.

In France, bankruptcy compelled the king to share his power, settling in the minds of the third estate — the representative of the people — how hollow were the pretentions of royal absolutism.

Similarly, it was an unsuccessful war that put the Russian system on the skids.

The black revolution has been long in coming. The enslavement of and then systematic deprivation of elementary rights to the Negro has given him ample cause for resentment.

Since the agents of this discrimination have been most immediately state and municipal governments, it is not surprising that the targets of black protest have been these agencies of government. Nor is it surprising that the Negro has looked to federal authority for redress. His one previous great advance, emancipation, had been achieved through the force of federal arms.

The target of the black revolution has been the federal system. Each successful confrontation with state power has resulted in a commensurate increase of federal governmental power. Thus the black American has speeded up the centralization of power.

But differences occur between revolutions. The men who made the American revolution remained united and avoided terror. They set their goal as independence and achieved it. They also successfully defended established rights. In a sense, they accepted change as necessary to preserve a long held self-government. Their intention was obviously conservative.

In France, the revolution set as its goal a fundamental change in the structure of government. Whereas in 1789 the call was for a constitutional monarchy, over the next six years, a republic was established, Louis XVI and a good part of the old order was decapitated, a democratic dictatorship briefly held sway, and finally military rule under Napoleon was imposed. The men who led this tumultous struggle split into rival factions. Thus the French revolution passed back into the hands of the moderate bourgeosie.

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION took its own peculiar turns. The first provisional government drew its manpower largely from the moderate, constitutionalist elements of the old duma (parliament); this was quickly superseded by a coalition of non-Bolshevik Socialists headed by Alexander Kerensky. Then power was seized by Lenin, followed by a civil war in which the Bolsheviks prevailed. The radical faction had triumphed.

Thus as the three foregoing instances indicate, there is no way to know for sure which faction will prevail in a revolution.

What then is the direction of the black revolution?

Unlike the American, French, or Russian revolutions, that of the American Negro is the revolt of a small minority against the restraints previously imposed by a huge majority. In large measure, previous success has been aided by a friendly federal authority and a host of white allies.

By putting Negro demands within the framework of legitimate white American aspirations, the black revolution has appeared conservative in its objectives. It is not meant to overthrow but to fulfill the American promise.

As the drive for equality succeeds, the Negro broadens his expectations and develops an enlarged self-awareness.

The once near-dumb apathy of the black masses is giving way to growing impatience. The old slogan "freedom now" is complemented by the cry for "black power."

In an affluent America, the Negro pushes for his share of the well-being. Much of the energy of urban riots is directed toward looting stores, a disorderly but a quick way to get some of the necessities and small luxuries of life.

THE INEFFECTIVENESS of urban government is starkly exposed in the inability of municipal police to keep order. Every time the National Guard is compelled to move into the streets, both the role and power of federal authority is accentuated. Whatever else has resulted from the "black revolution," it has revealed the supremacy of the federal government.

The leadership of the "black revolution" must now decide whether it is prepared to challenge its federal ally. To do so would be a risky business. There is little evidence that the white majority is disenchanted with the federal government. The call for "black power" is not likely to have a lasting impact. It needs a specific formulation for that purpose.

It invites disaster if it is reduced to "get whitey." It is implausible to think that "whitey" will accept his fate passively. It also replaces the racism of the white with that of the black. A resort to terror breeds a terror which eventually consumes its maker. In the French revolution, when Robespierre executed Danton he signed his death warrant.

When Stokely Carmichael talks of bringing the white American to his knees, he speaks the language of delusion.

For though the black American needs power, it is needful to remember that the white American has power.

Yet, the black American needs a lever with which to claim his fair share of the American abundance, and this gives the call for "black power" point. Implicit in the Negro agitation is his awareness that ownership of property is the prerequisite to power in America.

SPIVAK—Dr. King, despite all of your marches and demonstrations, and despite major civil rights laws, the civil rights crisis is getting worse rather than better. Or at least it seems so. Do you think it is growing worse, and if so, why?

KING—Well, I think at points it is growing worse. This does not mean that we have not made significant progress. But I think the real problem today is there is still a tragic gulf between promise and fulfillment, and that the rising expectations of freedom and equality, the rising expectations of improvement have met with little resutls, so the problem today is that we have the laws on the books but they have not been thoroughly implemented and there are still pockets of resistance that are seeking at hold the civil rights movement back in our just nd legal and moral aspirations for a democratic society, are still being met with these forces of resistance.

SPIVAK—Mr. Wilkins, do you think the crisis is getting better or worse?

WILKINS—I think only outwardly worse. We're having some manifestations of abrasive resistance. But actually progress is being made, we are going forward, and this despite the fact that great masses of people cannot count the difference between today's living and what they had, say a year ago or two years ago. But the forces are in motion. I agree with Dr. King that they're not moving fast enough, nor on a broad enough scale.

SPIVAK—Mr. Young, for many years we had no civil rights laws of an importance. Very little was being done by the white community for the Negro population or with the Negro population, and yet we had relative quiet. What is your explanation for the riots that are taking place at the present time?

High Aspiration Reflected

YOUNG—Well, I think it reflects this high aspiration of the Negro. I never felt that social progress could be a painless process. I don't think that the good race relation is purely the absence of conflict. In fact, we probably have less disruption in South Africa today where we have the greatest segregation and discrimination. I think what we are really facing today, and I think it's positive, and that is that the white community is now coming to find out that it takes more than the passage of laws which relieve their guilt, and it takes actual determination to live with and to work with and to cooperate with Negro citizens, and it's this ties have come out in the open, and I don't think you can blame the civil rights movement for that. Certainly no one would blame a physician for using his instruments and his skills and his know-how to reveal to a patient that he has cancer. Indeed, one would praise a physician for having the wisdom and the judgment and the power to do that. Now we have only revealed in Chicago that there is a blatant social, hate-filled cancer, and we haven't said even that it's an eternal state. We feel that it's curable, that it can be cured. But there is no doubt about the fact that the hate is here. We didn't create it, we merely exposed it and brought it to the surface.

ROWAN—Mr. Wilkins, despite the fact that you gentlemen sit here together there is a feeling around the country that there's a crisis of leadership in the civil rights movement. Do you agree that the movement toward Negro equality is jeopardized by what now seems to be a host of warring civil rights groups, each pursuing its own special interest?

WILKINS—No, Mr. Rowan, I don't think it's quite that serious. We tend to feel that unity should be exhibited at all times, no matter what kind of organizations or what kind of personalities of what kind of tactics are involved. I think we have to grow up to the idea that there will be differences of opinion and that these will manifest themselves from time to time. I don't see as yet any great split in the civil rights movement.

KILPATRICK — Dr. King, you have been quoted as saying that you have encountered more hatred among white opponents in Chicago than you demonstrations are now counter-productive. By continuing them don't you run the risk of doing more harm than good?

KING—Again I contend that we are not doing more harm than good in demonstrations because I think demonstrations serve the purpose of bringing the issues out in the open. I have never felt that demonstrations could actually solve the problem. They call attention to the problem, they dramatize the existence of certain social ills that could very easily be ignored if you did not have demonstrations, and I think the initial reaction to demonstrations is always negative.

When we had them in the South initially there was a negative outpouring of disagreement. Now that they have started on a massive scale in the North it is only natural that we would have this reaction; but in spite of the reaction, the demonstrations in Chicago, for instance, have not only brought the issues out but they have brought us to the conference table. And I don't believe that we would be in Chicago where we are today without demonstrations.

And let me say, secondly, that it is very important to see the difference between nonviolent demonstrations and riots. It may be true that in a demonstration people react with violence toward nonviolent demonstrators. But you don't blame the demonstrators. This would be like blaming the robbed man because his possession of money precipitated the evil act of robber.

Ultimately society must condemn the robber and not the robbed. It must protect the robbed, and this is where we are in these demonstrations: and tive. This method attacks the practice of discrimination but respects the person who discriminates. Do you still stand by that or have you changed your definition of nonviolence?

KILPATRICK — Mr. Carmichael, in a recent speech in Cleveland you reportedly ridiculed as Uncle Toms those Negro spokesmen who counsel nonviolence and patience in the civil rights struggle. Did you mean thus to label such spokesmen as Dr. King and Mr. Wilkins?

CARMICHAEL—let me first say that the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee will never publicly denounce any black leader in this country so that I couldn't have possibly said that.

KILPATRICK—In the same story you were quoted by the United Press International as saying that, "When you talk of 'black power' you talk of bringing this country to its knees." You weren't correctly quoted on that?

CARMICHAEL—The rest of it was not there. The other half of it said that when you talk about black power you talk about bringing this country to led its knees any time it messes with the black man.

EVANS—Dr. King, a couple of political questions. You said recently that the "extravagant promises" made a year ago in connection with the Voting Right Bills have now become "a shattered mockery." What exactly did you mean by that, Dr. King?

KING: Well, I mean that this Voting Rights Bill came into being to end not only discrimination in its overt expressions, and voter registration, but also to remove the basis for black power and we didn't know that.

We thought that the work we have been doing for the past six years has been the basis for black power because that's all we have been working on in SNCC.

SPIVAK—Well, Mr. Carmichael, will you yourself answer, do you believe that there are 180 million racists in this country?

CARMICHAEL—I would say that the system in this country that is set up that affects all of us, black and white, allows for white supremacy to reigns in this country, and that it does not allow for any white person to view a black person as his equal, but rather to view him as inferior because of the system, and that has nothing to do wit hthe white person himself.

He or she may be a good guy or a bady guy, but that the systme just allows to see black people as inferior, and that the few black people that are allowed to escape are seen—are viewed as exceptions to the rule.

MEREDITH—Well, of course I believe it. In the first place, nonviolence is incompatible with American ideas. This is a military-minded nation and it always has been. I think this country is one that basically is a tough country. It is a frontier type of mentality. And everyone has the philosophy—you do right but you make sure everyone else does right as well.

Now, my father never shot anybody. But he always had a gun above his bed and shells within reach. And I am sure that if someone had broken in his house to disturb his family, he would have shot someone.

King and others speak about nonviolence, they say that groups of Negroes shouldn't take arms and—

MEREDITH—That is the trick in the whole thing. Nonviolence is not the opposite of violence. And this is where the whole trick is in this whole business of nonviolence.

SPIVAK—But there is a difference between self-defense—I don't think there ar many of us who don't believe in the right of sefl-defense by any Negro against anyone who attacks him.

MEREDITH:—Nonviolence as the opposite of violence, this is where this country has been trying to lead the Negro down a wrong road. They have been trying to say to him, "If you are not nonviolent, if you don't turn the other cheek, you are violent."

They took the Negro as he was in 1960 or whenever it was and they atached this name nonviolence to him and thereby gave a legitimacy to a particular movement. And this changed nothing. It just gave a name to what already existed and gave the implication that if this were not the case, there would be violence. And the Negro has never entertained the idea of taking up arms against the white, and they cannot.

Now, you take Mississippi, for instance. Now I know the people that shot in my home years ago. They know the people that killed all of the Negroes that have been killed. The community knows those people.

I am here to say that these people have to be removed from our society. White citizens have come out in the open, and if they have to be removed. You can't have killers running around in the society killing people.

SPIVAK—Are you suggesting, then, that if several Negroes are killed or any white men are killed and the law does not punish them, as happens very often in the case of white men, too, that people ought to organize vigilantes and go out and take the law into their own hands and commit violence?

MEREDITH—That is exactly what I am saying, exactly.

SPIVAK—Mr. Meredits, this doesn't even make sense against 180 million people. If you do it, they are going to do it.

MEREDITH—Let me explain it. If you let my explain it, then you will understand. In Mississippi, most of the whites in Mississippi are good whites. They don't like this. They condone it. They dislike it, they tell me this. But they are powerless to do anything about it. They are just like a father who is incestuous and he sleeps with his daughter, but he wants to stop his son from sleeping with his mother. Now, this is what white supremacy does. The hites in Mississippi don't like th ewhites to go around killing Negroes. But they have tolerated it so long until the law, they cannot bring themselves to enforce. And we got to stop this.

ROWAN—Mr. Carmichael, do I detect that you agree with Mr. Meredith that the Negro may have to take up arms?

CARMICHAEL—Let it remain crystal clear that in this country we are the only people who have to protect ourselves against our protection. We have to protect ourselves against state troopers, against police in Mississippi. And if we do not protect ourselves, since the police forces of this country and the Federal Government and the law officials are not protecting us, then who is going to protect us! And I agree 150 per cent that black people have to move to the position where they organize themselves and they are in fact their protection for each other.

While we may be 10 per cent inside the country, continental borders of the United States, we want to make it crystal clear that we are well located in cities across this country. And if in fact 180 million people just think they are going to turn on us and we are going to sit there like the Nazis did to the Jews, they are wrong. We are going to go down together, all of us.

And the second thing is that we want this country to be crystal clear, to understand that its army is integrated and in Vietnam, 40 per cent of your fighting forces are black people.

"This marks the further intensification of the U.S.S.R.-United States collusion," Peking's New China News Agency said in a broadcast heard here yesterday.

Epidemic Fight Stymied Again

DALLAS, Aug. 21 (AP)—Poor visibility prevented thre Air Force planes this mornin

King that they're not moving fast enough, nor on a broad enough scale.

SPIVAK — Mr. Young, for many years we had no civil rights laws of an importance. Very little was being done by the white community for the Negro population or with the Negro population, and yet we had relative quiet. What is your explanation for the riots that are taking place at the present time?

High Aspiration Reflected

YOUNG—Well, I think it reflects this high aspiration of the Negro. I never felt that social progress could be a painless process. I don't think that the good race relation is purely the absence of conflict. In fact, we probably have less disruption in South Africa today where we have the greatest segregation and discrimination. I think what we are really facing today, and I think it's positive, and that is that the white community is now coming to find out that it takes more than the passage of laws which relieve their guilt, and it takes actual determination to live with and to work with and to cooperate with Negro citizens, and it's this final confrontation that people find most difficult to make.

SPIVAK — Mr. McKissick, what do you think? Do you think things are getting better or worse?

McKISSICK — I'm of the opinion that things have not progressed tremendously for the masses of the people. I would not dispute the statement that some progress has been made. But I would say, by and large, the average black man in the ghetto has not profited within the last 10 years. I think the last statistics showed, and I think even last week at the hearing in Washington—here at the — [Senator Abraham A.] Ribicoff [Democrat of Connecticut], when he made the statement—we'll find that we've got more discrimination in education, more segregated school systems. We find the unemployment rate is higher now than ever before. I think we could just go down the line and we could find that the situation has not improved as far as the masses are concerned, and that's what the Congress of Racial Equality is concerned with.

SPIVAK — Mr. Carmichael, from your experience are things getting better or worse?

CARMICHAEL—Well, I don't know if you can make a comparison like that. I believe that what is happening is that black people across the country are becoming politically aware of their position, of their strength and of their ability to move and based on that feeling, the masses of people are beginning to now move, and the question is whether or not this country is going to be able to meet their needs peacefully or whether they will have to move to disrupt this country in order to force the country to speak to their needs.

SPIVAK—Mr. Meredith, may I hear from you on that? Do you think things are getting better or worse?

Facing the Issue

MEREDITH — Well, I think we've just reached a point in our history where we are really beginning to face the issue in question. And the question in this country is what is the basis or what is going to be the basis of our society? Up until now it's been based on the theory of white superiority, and now this nation has to make decisions on whether we will continue to use this base of white supremacy or whether we will live up to our ideals of equality and equal justice before the law.

SPIVAK—Dr. King, I'd like to come back to you now. The Superintendent of Police of Chicago, Mr. O. W. Wilson, said the other day that your civil rights tactics have aroused hatred among Chicago whit\ residents and are hampering the Negro's progress. What's your answer to that?

KING—Well, my answer is that this is totally erroneous. Our civil rights efforts have not aroused hatred, they have revealed a hatred that already existed. There is no doubt about the fact that there are many latent hostilities existing within certain white groups in the North, and what has happened now is that these latent hostili- it can be cured. But there is no doubt about the fact that the hate is here. We didn't create it, we merely exposed it and brought it to the surface.

ROWAN—Mr. Wilkins, despite the fact that you gentlemen sit here together there is a feeling around the country that there's a crisis of leadership in the civil rights movement. Do you agree that the movement toward Negro equality is jeopardized by what now seems to be a host of warring civil rights groups, each pursuing its own special interest?

WILKINS—No, Mr. Rowan, I don't think it's quite that serious. We tend to feel that unity should be exhibited at all times, no matter what kind of organizations or what kind of personalities of what kind of tactics are involved. I think we have to grow up to the idea that there will be differences of opinion and that these will manifest themselves from time to time. I don't see as yet any great split in the civil rights movement.

KILPATRICK — Dr. King, you have been quoted as saying that you have encountered more hatred among white opponents in Chicago than you have encountered in the Deep South. How do you account for this?

KING — Well, I think for years the hatred, existed beneath the surface in Northern communities, and as I said earlier, it is coming out now. I think also we have to see that this is something of a dislike for the unliked, and you see it a great deal among the lower income ethnic enclaves who have basic fears about Negroes. They have grown up believing in certain stereotypes, whether it's the stereotype of the Negroes are lazy or inherently inferior, or whether it is a myth that Negroes depreciate property values when they move in a community.

KILPATRICK—Let me ask about your march today, Dr. King. You have decided, as I understand it, to obey the injunction that was laid down limiting the number of demonstrators?

KING—Yes.

KILPATRICK—Even though you have described that twice yesterday I believe as an unjust order?

KING—Yes. It's an injunction which I feel is unjust and totally unconstitutional, but because wea are engaged in negotiations now with the city, with the real estate agents and with labor and industry and other forces of power and good will in the community we decided that we would abide by this injunction until we have our negotiating session next Friday and determine on the basis of that whether we would continue to comply with what we consider a blatantly unjusct, unconstitutional and I might say, immoral injunction.

EVANS—Mr. Young, you had to contend with a new sort of militancy at your national convention in Philadelphia. What exactly did the younger Urban Leaguer want that is new? And let me ask you also, did they feel that the Urban League has become too identified today with the middle class?

YOUNG—No, I think that that reflected more and impatience with the pace. Urban League staff people are probably in the best position of any to recognize how slowly the gap is closing, if at all, in economics, in education, in housing, in health and welfare. And I think it recognizes also that we can do all we went to in terms of getting parents motivated into getting their children into school and keeping them there; but unless there are school boards that are so politically structured and politicallv sensitive enough to provide the resources, then our efforts to provide the motivation is of no value. And what they're really saying is we need these other activities; we need the other organizations who are doing the political activity. The Urban Leaguers know that we are not middle class in the sense of our services. Last year, for example, over fifty thousand Negroes were placed through the Urban League, and these were poor people who were placed, unemployed people.

VALERIANI—Dr. King, to follow up Mr. Spivak's question, recent polls suggest that in terms of national reaction, demonstrations, and I think the initial reaction to demonstrations is always negative.

When we had them in the South initially there was a negative outpouring of disagreement. Now that they have started on a massive scale in the North it is only natural that we would have this reaction; but in spite of the reaction, the demonstrations in Chicago, for instance, have not only brought the issues out but they have brought us to the conference table. And I don't believe that we would be in Chicago where we are today without demonstrations.

And let me say, secondly, that it is very important to see the difference between nonviolent demonstrations and riots. It may be true that in a demonstration people react with violence toward nonviolent demonstrators. But you don't blame the demonstrators. This would be like blaming the robbed man because his possession of money precipitated the evil act of robber.

Ultimately society must condemn the robber and not the robbed. It must protect the robbed, and this is where we are in these demonstrations; and I'm still convinced that there is nothing more powerful to dramatize a social evil than the tramp, tramp of marching feet.

VALERIANI—In regard to your present movement in regard to housing, is it not conceivable to you that a majority of white Americans does not want a Negro for a neighbor, and if that's so as it was demonstrated in a vote in California, should the majority preference be respected?

KING—It's quite true that there are many people who are against open housing and who are against having Negroes as their neighbor. This does not mean that we don't go all-out to end housing discrimination. It may be true that in the South many white people do not want Negroes to eat at lunch counters, do not want Negroes to have access to hotels and motels and restaurants. But this did not stop the nation from having its conscience so aroused that it brought into being a civil rights law as a result of our movement to end this.

Now I think the same thing must happen to housing. The people have these fears, they have these prejudices and we are only saying that through legislation and a vigorous of fair-housing bills we will be able to change certain conditions. It doesn't mean that we will change the hearts of people, but we will change the laws and habits of people, and once their habits are changed pretty soon people adjust to them just as in the South they've adjusted to integrated public accommodations.

I think in the North and all over the country people will adjust to living next door to a Negro once they know that it has to be done, once realtors stop all o fthe block-busting and the panic-peddling and all of that. When the law makes it clear and it's vigorously enforced we will see that people will not only adjust but they will finally come to the point that even their attitudes are changed.

SPIVAK — Mr. McKissick, you've been quoted as saying, and these are the words: "The civil rights movement in 1966 has reached the moment of truth. And Negro leaders are not telling it to us like it is.

Will you tell us how you see the moment of truth that we're not being told?

McKISSICK—First of all, I believe that the moment of truth is here for the simple reason that, one, nonviolence is something of the past. At our recent convention in Baltimore, the convention went on record favoring self-defense. Their attitude was that we are an organization fighting for constitutional rights, and one of those rights is the right to defend the home and the person. I think, too, it is difficult now to have the control over demonstrations for the simple reason that most of the black people will not agree to be nonviolent. They will not agree to be hit and to passively stand there and not return blow for blow.

SPIVAK—Mr. McKissick, in your literature as late as 1965 you said nonviolence is effec- CARMICHAEL—let me first say that the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee will never publicly denounce any black leader in this country so that I couldn't have possibly said that.

KILPATRICK—In the same story you were quoted by the United Press International as saying that, "When you talk of 'black power' you talk of bringing this country to its knees." You weren't correctly quoted on that?

CARMICHAEL—The rest of it was not there. The other half of it said that when you talk about black power you talk about bringing this country to led its knees any time it messes with the black man.

EVANS—Dr. King, a couple of political questions. You said recently that the "extravagant promises" made a year ago in connection with the Voting Right Bills have now become "a shattered mockery." What exactly did you mean by that, Dr. King?

KING: Well, I mean that this Voting Rights Bill came into being to end not only discrimination in its overt expressions, and voter registration, but also to remove the atmosphere of intimidation for economic reprisals and the for creation of fear that cause people not to vote, and one of the things we have found is that when you have Federal registrars in communities, many more Negroes go out to register because they see a different atmosphere, and they are not over-arched, under-girded with the fear of intimidation and economic reprisals as much as they do in dealing with some of the local registrars that they have dealt with so long.

Now, the problem is that after that bill came into being very few registrars were sent into the South, I mean Federal registrars, and even today all too few have been sent, and this is even true in some communities where we know that there are outright patterns of discrimination.

VALERIANA—Mr. Meredith, looking back what do you feel your march on Mississippi accomplished?

MEREDITH—Well, if you recall I didn't march through Mississippi. I was shot on the first day, and of course, all of those other gentlemen carried on the march in Mississippi. I only returned for the last two days.

Now, I think that probably the biggest accomplishment was to place in focus the problems in this country, and as again I say the question is whether or not white supremacy and the best of the theory of white superiority is going to be the rule in this country or if we are, in fact, going to follow the rule of equality and equal justice before the law as our ideals say.

SPIVAK—Mr. Carmichael, you have said over and over again that the white press have distorted your use of the slogan "black power." Will you tell us here and now exactly what you mean by "black power" so that all of us can understand your meaning without misquoting you or distorting you?

CARMICHAEL—I am sorry you asked that question now because two days ago the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee decided that we are not going to define the term "black power" any more.

SPIVAK—Well, now, granted that you won't define it, it has been—there has been a position paper of SNCC's organization published in The New York Times, and in that position paper these words of the SNCC organization are quoted: "When we view the masses of white people, we view in reality 180 million racists."

Now, was The New York Times misquoting SNCC and its philosophy of black power?

CARMICHAEL—Well, in the first place, that paper was written by some people in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, it was not a public paper. We don't know how The New York Times got hold of it. The paper is 75 pages long.

I don't see how it is possible for them to assume that in one page of their anti-black newspaper that they could publish the thoughts of the 75-page paper. And they said, not the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, that it was the for white supremacy to reigns in this country, and that it does not allow for any white person to view a black person as his equal, but rather to view him as inferior because of the system, and that has nothing to do wit hthe white person himself.

He or she may be a good guy or a bady guy, but that the systme just allows to see black people as inferior, and that the few black people that are allowed to escape are seen—are viewed as exceptions to the rule.

MEREDITH—Well, of course I believe it. In the first place, nonviolence is incompatible with American ideas. This is a military-minded nation and it always has been. I think this country is one that basically is a tough country. It is a frontier type of mentality. And everyone has the philosophy—you do right but you make sure everyone else does right as well.

Now, my father never shot anybody. But he always had a gun above his bed and shells within reach. And I am sure that if someone had broken in his house to disturb his family, he would have shot someone.

SPIVAK—Well, Mr. Meredith, don't you think we ought to get straight on the difference between nonviolence and self-defense? I think when Dr. of self-defense by any Negro against anyone who attacks him.

MEREDITH:—Nonviolence as the opposite of violence, this is where this country has been trying to lead the Negro down a wrong road. They have been trying to say to him, "If you are not nonviolent, if you don't turn the other cheek, you are violent."

They took the Negro as he was in 1960 or whenever it was and they atached this name nonviolence to him and thereby gave a legitimacy to a particular movement. And this changed nothing. It just gave a name to what already existed and gave the implication that if this were not the case, there would be violence. And the Negro has never entertained the idea of taking up arms against the white, and they cannot.

Now, you take Mississippi, for instance. Now I know the people that shot in my home years ago. They know the people that killed all of the Negroes that have been killed. The community knows those people.

I am here to say that these people have to be removed from our society. White supremacy will not allow itself to remove these people from its society. Now, if they don't find a way, the Negro has no choice but to remove these men and country we are the only people who have to protect ourselves against our protection. We have to protect ourselves against state troopers, against police in Mississippi. And if we do not protect ourselves, since the police forces of this country and the Federal Government and the law officials are not protecting us, then who is going to protect us! And I agree 150 per cent that black people have to move to the position where they organize themselves and they are in fact their protection for each other.

While we may be 10 per cent inside the country, continental borders of the United States, we want to make it crystal clear that we are well located in cities across this country. And if in fact 180 million people just think they are going to turn on us and we are going to sit there like the Nazis did to the Jews, they are wrong. We are going to go down together, all of us.

And the second thing is that we want this country to be crystal clear, to understand that its army is integrated and in Vietnam, 40 per cent of your fighting forces are black people. And if you think those black people are going to fight a war while 180 million people turn on its fellow black brothers inside this country and continue fighting a war, you are mistaken.

KING OPPOSES AT FORUM

Meredith Says It'll Require Violence

By JOHN HERBERS
(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON—The six leading civil rights leaders expressed Sunday a wide range of frequently conflicting opinions on how to meet the nation's mounting racial crisis. These included use of violence by Negroes and more street demonstrations in northern cities.

James Meredith, who integrated the University of Mississippi in 1962, said that Negroes should take the law into their own hands and "remove" whites who attack them.

Stokeley Carmichael, chairman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, agreed with Meredith, saying if 180 million white Americans "turn on us we will all go down together."

On the other hand, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. reiterated his adherence to non-violence but said more street demonstrations will be necessary to expose social ills that exist in all parts of the nation.

TRAMP, TRAMP

"There is no more effective way to dramatize a social evil than the tramp, tramp of marching feet," said King.

The Negro leaders appeared together on a special 90-minute NBC television presentation of "Meet the Press." The other three appearing were Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Whitney M. Young, director of the National Urban League, and Floyd B. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality.

King left the program when it was half over to return to Chicago, where he is leading demonstrations.

Generally, the Negro leaders expressed, with more clarity and focus, views that have been made publicly since the slogan "black power" became an issue in the civil rights movement. It was the first time in recent months that the leaders of the top civil rights organizations had been brought together into one forum.

DENY SPLIT

Although they denied at the outset that the movement is deeply divided, it became apparent later in the program that there continues to be a divergence of opinion on how Negroes should proceed in attaining equality in America.

For example, Carmichael said he would never advocate that any black man fight for the United States in Viet Nam. Meredith, now a student at Columbia University Law School, said he considered the war "one of the best things happening to the Negro."

Carmichael referred to Negro Americans fighting in Viet Nam as "black mercenaries" because frequently the armed forces provide the only means of employment to Negroes in this country.

"I would not fight in Viet Nam, absolutely not," Carmichael said. "I would advise every black man not to fight in Viet Nam."

RUSTIN ASSESSES NEGRO VIOLENCE

Says Ghetto Tactics Have Impressed Colored Youth

By GENE CURRIVAN
Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, Aug. 23—"Any Negro youngster who doesn't believe now that the way to get something is through violence obviously is not intelligent," Bayard Rustin, dynamic civil rights leader who advocates nonviolence, asserted today.

While deploring violence as a hindrance to Negroes' objectives, Mr. Rustin held that Negroes were gaining the belief from experiences such as those in Chicago and in the Watts district of Los Angeles that they cannot get their way without it.

Mr. Rustin spoke at the 50th annual convention of the American Federation of Teachers at the Edgewater Beach Hotel. He advised the teachers that boycotts and srikes might be all right as a last resort, but the proper approach to achieve smaller classes, higher salaries, fair employment and housing was to have these things written into their contracts.

Mr. Rustin, who organized the civil rights march on Washington in 1963, said the rights movement had improved since then, but he contended that over the last 12 years since the Supreme Court decision on segregation in 1964 the number of Negroes had risen in slums, among the unemployed and in segregated classrooms.

As a result of this, he said, the poor Negroes have turned against leaders both white and Negro, terming them "no good," and have taken the rights struggle into their own hands.

Mr. Rustin told of meeting a young Negro from Watts after the riots. The youth spoke of the "manifesto" that had brought about "victory." The manisfesto, the youth said, was a box of matches.

Years of Frustration

"Man, for years we've been trying to get the Mayor to come out and talk to us but he wouldn't come," Mr. Rustin quoted the unidentified Negro as saying.

"For years we tried to get the Governor but he wouldn't come. For years we tried to get all those white folks downtown, the whole power structure to come and pay some attention to us and they wouldn't come. But after we burned [illegible] the

"For years we tried to get the Governor but he wouldn't come. For years we tried to get all those white folks downtown, the whole power structure to come and pay some attention to us and they wouldn't come. But after we burned, baby, the whole world came to look at us. You run out on those streets and there are so many sociologists from the colleges that you will trip over them."

There is a similar situation in Chicago, according to Mr. Rustin. He noted that where the Negroes asked for water sprinklers during the summer they found that they only got them after violence had erupted.

Mr. Rustin contended, however, that the answer was not violence or black power, to which he objects, but a revitalization of labor, civil rights, religious and student movements.

The Negro leader made this assessment:

"The problem is that white America has sat on its buttocks and sent money to Negroes but didn't join the social revolution. The Negro is isolated in his movement. The need is not to talk about civil rights but about an economic and social revolution. We must deal sensibly with this problem or we won't have peace."

Program Outlined

"Now my friends," Mr. Rustin said, "I therefore believe that there is a program which we must fight for and that program is full and fair employment, guaranteed income, minimum wages, the overhaul completely of the whole system of welfare, training for which people are paid while they learn that which they need."

He urged that the truth about American history be told, including the good and the bad.

Mr. Rustin characterized many of the present textbooks as "vicious" and he charged that the United States Senate, principally because of its filibusters, was "the most disgusting body in the Western world."

Nevertheless, the Negro leader said he was not despairing "because there is great vitality in the nation."

He advised the teachers, who were holding the second session of a five-day convention, "to get on your high horse and see the things you want written into contracts and something is bound to give."

A. Philip Randolph, Negro head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, spoke, praising the rights marches led by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., but he noted that "trouble and a baptism of fire" often accompanied most social changes and revolutions.

Mr. Randolph compared the marches with strikes and picket lines of the worker seeking to improve his condition.

Later, during a television interview, Mr. Rustin also supported the marches led by Dr. King, saying they were helpful "beccause the Negro has to have a place to move."

Troubles Delay IRT Trains

Brake and signal trouble delayed two Seventh Avenue IRT subway trains during the morning rush hour yesterday. The Transit Authority said a northbound express was delayed at 72d Street for 12 minutes, starting at 7:21 A.M., by signal trouble. A southbound express developed brake trouble just south of 116th Street at 8:01 A.M. and was delayed 11 minutes.

Rights Aides Score A Plan to "Salvage' Military Rejects

NYT 8/29/66

MOVEMENT

Civil rights leaders denounced yesterday Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara's proposal for "salvaging" draft rejects on the grounds that it would place undue hardships on Negroes.

According to Defense Department manpower experts possibly 30 per cent of the 40,000 rejects who would enter the military services under the program during the next ten months would be Negroes.

Mr. McNamara made his proposal here Tuesday in an address before the convention of Veterans of Foreign Wars. He announced that special military training programs were being prepared to rehabilitate men rejected for military service for physical or mental deficiencies. He said the men would be inducted and given training to bring them up to acceptable standards.

Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan, called the plan "genocide." "It's brutal," Mr. Powell said in a telephone interview from Washington. "It's nothing more than killing off human beings that are not members of the elite."

Mr. Powell said that the mortality rate would probably be higher among those "salvaged" called because "they are the least equipped to handle sophisticated weapons."

Floyd B. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, said the plan was "a cynical method to punish black youths for the social ills imposed on them by the major society."

In a statement issued by CORE, Mr. McKissick said that training for participation in the armed forces would "increase the imbalance of black Americans in the war in Vietnam."

The National Urban League said it was "concerned about any kind of procedure which places a hardship on the Negro who is already carrying a disproportionate percentage of the burdens in the war in Vietnam at this time."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People had no comment. The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, could not be reached for comment.

TAX AGENCY FILES LIEN AGAINST CORE MOVEMENT

$22,500 Action Points Up Group's Money Troubles

NYT 8/27/66

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

The Internal Revenue Service has filed a lien against the Congress of Racial Equality for $22,500 in taxes allegedly collected from CORE employes but not transmitted to the revenue agency.

A spokesman for the agency said the lien was for income taxes and Social Security taxes deducted during the first two quarters of this year. He said the lien was filed earlier this week in Federal Distric Court here.

Interviewed yesterday by telephone, CORE's associate director, Lincoln Lynch, refused to comment on the lien.

"We have not been advised by the I.R.S. that such a lien has been filed," he said "We really don't know if it exists."

Mr. Lynch conceded, however, that the civil rights group was in "serious financial straits."

The organization has effected drastic economy moves in recent months. Its staff has been cut back about 30 per cent.

65 On National Staff

Some field employes of long standing have been let go, and the national staff has been reduced to 65 workers, most of whom operate across the nation.

The national staff has been reduced to 65 workers, most of whom operate across the nation. Those let go included some field employes of long standing.

This week CORE moved its headquarters from 38 Park Row in downtown Manhattan to 200 West 135th Street in Harlem.

The downtown rent was about $1,000 a month; the rent in Harlem is about $500.

Three years ago CORE's annual budget was about $1-million, with most of the contributions coming from white liberals. Fund raisers for the organization say that passage of such measures as the Civil Rights Act of 1964, antipoverty legislation and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 made many whites feel that contributions were no longer needed.

The 'Black Power' Issue

In addition, CORE's outspoken advocacy of "black power" has caused many would-be contributors among whites to withhold their gifts.

Although Mr. Lynch has declined to discuss the organization's finances in detail, a recently resigned official said the current deficit was above $350,000.

Mr. Lynch said yesterday that the principal reason for moving to Harlem was to be in closer contact with Negroes and their needs. He said the decision to move was reached in March.

Another spokesman said the organization planned to concentrate on community organization, political activity, the organization of business combines and cooperatives, and other political-financial, self-help activities in the nation's slums and among the rural poor.

"We felt it was important," the spokesman said, "to have our base in the heart of the most extensive Negro ghetto in the nation."

Whites on Staff

About 10 of the current 65 employes are white and there are no plans for CORE to become all-Negro, Mr. Lynch said.

"I think the white press should worry less about CORE becoming all black and more about whether we are doing an effective job in the ghettos and on the farms," he said.

Mr. Lynch insisted that his group was doing an effective job. As an example he cited a cooperative of 360 Negro and 15 white sweet potato farmers in Opelousas, St. Landry Parish, (County), in South Central Louisiana.

"This is one CORE project everyone overlooks while trying to see if we're getting rid of our white members," he said.

Mr. Lynch said the cooperative had been organized and was being directed by a 20-year-old white youth, John Zippert of New York. "He works for $25 a week," Mr. Lynch said.

Seven of the whites still employed on the national staff are field workers, earning from $25 to $50 a week, he said, and three are employed in the Harlem office.

'Pillar of Strength'

One of the staff members let go was Richard Haley, a former associate national director of CORE who, for the last two years, ran the organization's Southern regional office in New Orleans.

Mr. Haley had previously been the head of the music department at Florida A. & M. University. A former CORE official described Mr. Haley yesterday as "a quiet, dignified pillar of strength in what was often a din of confusion."

Mr. Haley will work for the Peace Corps, Mr. Lynch said.

Another to go was David Dennis, a CORE worker in hte South for about six years, who had helped organize the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party.

'All but Destroyed'

PLAINFIELD, Vt., Aug. 26 (AP)—Bayard Rustin, the civil rights leader, says the Congress of Racial Equality is dead and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is dying.

Mr. Rustin told a Goddard College labor seminar last night that "CORE is all but destroyed now and nothing creative can come out of SNCC."

He said that the groups' leaders, Floyd B. McKissick of CORE and Stokely Carmichael of the student committee, were out of touch with the Negro population.

Their slogan of "black power," he said, is nothing but an emotional reaction to 300 years of second-class citizenship.

Mr. Rustin, organizer of the 1963 Civil Rights march on Washington, said that Mr. Carmichael's reaction might be emotionally honest but was not political.

"Stokely's isolation is a sickness," he said.

"It is the labor movement which has done the most, is doing the most and will continue to do the most to lift the Negro out of his condition," Mr. Rustin said.

Deplores Black Power Idea —Sociologist Disagrees

NYT 9/1/66

The growth of the "black power" concept may be attributed to the political ineffectiveness of the labor-liberal-Negro coalition, Bayard Rustin, the civil rights leader, argues in the September issue of Commentary magazine.

Mr. Rustin, an advocate of nonviolence, calls for a strengthening and rejuvenation of the coalition to prevent further estrangement of Negroes and whites.

But, writing in defense of black power in Commentary, Professor David Danzig of the Columbia University School of Social Work contends that the old coalition is beyond repair and should be replaced by a new alliance made up of urban blocs. Its primary purpose would be to press for a "genuine assault" on the problems of the American city.

Mr. Rustin argues that black power not only is of no real value to the civil rights movement but also is harmful. He says it diverts the movement from "meaningful" debate over strategy and tactics," isolates the Negro community and encourages the growth of anti-Negro forces.

Used by Carmichael

The black power slogan first came to national attention in June during the so-called "Meredith March" through Mississippi. Stokely Carmichael, the national chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, used it frequently then and has since elaborated on it numerous times.

But an exact definition of the phrase has been a stumbling point for both Negroes and whites and even a S.N.C.C. decument on the concept has not dispelled the confusion.

One paragraph of the document states: "If we are to proceed toward true liberation, we must cut outselves off from white people. We must form our own institutions, credit unions, co-ops, political parties, write our own histories."

Mr. Rustin writes in Commentary:

"Carmichael, incidentally, is in the paradoxical position of screaming at liberals — wanting only to "get whitey off my back" — and simultaneously needing their support: after all, he can talk about Negroes taking over Lowndes County (Alabama) only because there is a fairly liberal Federal Government to protect him should Governor Wallace decide to eliminate this pocket of black power."

Color Not Important

Mr. Rustin says that the important question is not whether a politician is Negro or white but what political forces he represents. "Manhattan," Mr. Rustin notes, "has had a succession of Negro borough presidents and yet the schools are increasingly segregated."

Professor Danzig defends the black power concept, he says, because he sees no danger from organized Negroes. He writes that the Negroes to fear are "the disorganized, the disenfranchised and the hopeless."

King Wins Cheers After Critic's Blast

CHICAGO (AP) — A shouting advocate of black power preempted the rostrum from Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Wednesday night, but his militant talk drew a biting blast from King that had his followers cheering in the aisles.

King received a standing ovation, mixed with some jeers, as he told bearded Monroe Sharp, Chicago chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee: "When pharaoh wanted to keep the people in slavery, he kept the slaves fighting among themselves.

"I understand that the cry for black power is here because of the reluctance of white power to make the necessary changes, the necessary concessions.

"The longer we wait to solve our problems in this country, the longer we will be hearing these misguided cries all over this nation.

"I don't believe in white power — I don't believe in black power—I believe in human power."

Before the jeers from the rear of the crowded South Side church prompted King to give his critics the platform, leaflets protesting King's civil rights tactics and his recent signing of an open-housing pact with Chicago civic leaders were distributed.

One read in part: "Wake up brother! We got to get us some black power — so the black man can speak for himself."

When the cries of "black power!" broke out inside the church, King yielded the platform, saying: "This is a free, democratic society and we have a brother who wants to talk about black power."

Within a five-minute time limit, enforced by King's aides, Sharp said King put too much emphasis on demonstrations, negotiations and cooperation with white persons.

Sharp called for intense political and social organization in the slums, saying that the Negro must first control his own neighborhood before he moves into white areas. He said that Negroes living in integrated areas tend, through imitation, to lose the best qualities of their race.

"You don't get your freedom by tramp, tramp, tramping," Sharp said, referring to open-housing marches. The marches in hostile white neighborhoods were the prelude to the summit conference that adopted the "open-city" agreement.

"It is still dark around America and I know some people get understandably impatient," King declared. "Somebody is still asking—how long? My answer is—not long."

Earlier, King said his forces would support a strike by 130 workers at Saks Fifth Avenue, a fashionable Chicago clothing store, and said he had the support of employes of the Saks store and Gimbel's department store in New York City.

If a settlement is not reached within 10 days of a strike, he said, "Saks may find 1,000 to 2,000 Negroes trying on clothes all day long."

YOUNG ASKS DRIVE TO EDUCATE WHITES

MOVEMENT NYT 9/21/66

The executive director of the National Urban League, Whitney M. Young Jr., called yesterday for a "massive education program for whites, to convince them of their responsibility in supporting democracy."

He said most American whites were the "gentle people of prejudice" who are neither pro nor anti civil rights but who take no stand at all and who allow racial discrimination to flourish by their silence.

Speaking before the 10th annual fall conference of the Magazine Publishers Association at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, Mr. Young estimated that 10 per cent of white America was bigoted and another 10 per cent dedicated to civil rights but that the vast majority, 80 per cent, took no stand.

He told the publishers and editors they should use their facilities to promote a better understanding of the progress being made in race relations and chided them for what he called an emphasis an excitement and controversy.

Mr. Young had strong words also for Negro "demogogues," whom he called creations of the "white press" anxious for a "daily dose of conflict." "The Negro has as much right to his crackpots as whites and he should not be penalized for them," Mr. Young said.

SNCC 'Nonviolent' Only in Name

By WAYNE KELLEY

Under the leadership of its militant young chairman, Stokely Carmichael, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) has stamped "violence" on its definition of "black power."

The definition was cemented Tuesday afternoon when, city officials charged, SNCC workers helped whip up emotions in a slum neighborhood following the shooting and arrest of a Negro suspect by local police.

William Ware, a SNCC leader, has been charged with inciting a riot. Mr. Carmichael, the 24-year-old SNCC chairman, was on hand when the unruly crowds gathered by chants of "black power."

It was the third time in nine months that SNCC activities here have required police action. Tuesday, for the first time, things got out of hand.

Thus with actions, if not with words, SNCC has apparently completed a metamorphosis from a campus-orientated sit-in group in the early 1960's to an organization feeding on social disorders.

THE CHANGE first came dramaticly to public attention late in 1965 when SNCC officials released a statement highly critical of United States involvement in the Viet Nam war.

Julian Bond, public relations officer for SNCC and then representatives-elect to the Georgia House of Representatives from Atlanta, endorsed the statement referring to U.S. soldiers as "aggressors" and their actions in Viet Nam as "murder."

Mr. Bond was denied his seat by a vote of the House. SNCC, in cooperation with Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), staged a march on the State Capitol. Some SNCC workers rushed the Capitol steps and there were brief scuffles with state troopers in the doorways.

But it was in May 1966 that SNCC, originally devoted to voter registration efforts in hostile Southern communities and rarely to demonstrations, took a bigger turn.

The organization voted out chairman John Lewis, a 26-year-old minister who believed in nonviolence as "a way of life," and installed Mr. Carmichael.

SNCC DECIDED to purge itself of white influences. But a position paper maintained: "Our position does not stem from 'hatred' or 'racism' against white people, but from a conscientious effort to develop the best methods of solving our national problem."

Mr. Carmichael, who has advocated economic and political take-overs by Negroes, has repeatedly stated that any reference to violence has been a result of white guilt rather than SNCC intentions.

But last month SNCC organizers were in the forefront with "black power" chants when a crowd attempted to prevent the arrest of a SNCC member on a traffic charge.

SNCC policies have been vague about future plans for aiding Negroes to a better life. And Wednesday, Atlanta Police Chief Herbert Jenkins said he was willing to strike the "non" from the "nonviolent" portion of the SNCC label.

Julian Bond Gets Out of Snick

9/9/66 AC

By BILL SHIPP

Julian Bond quit the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee Thursday after he told two Atlanta Constitution staff members he thought the organization had gone "kind of crazy."

Julian Bond

Bond also said SNCC hadn't paid his salary lately. Bond, twice denied a seat in the Georgia House because he endorsed the anti-Viet Nam views of SNCC, was information director of the now-militant group.

Bond, 26, one of the original members of the organization, said he disagreed with the policies of Snick's present chairman, Stokely Carmichael, and termed Tuesday's riot "most unfortunate."

BLAME SNCC

Both Negro and white leaders have blamed the riot on SNCC.

Asked what he thought of the recent actions of SNCC, including its attempt to invade an Atlanta Army Induction Center, Bond said he thought the affair "kind of crazy."

Commenting on his pay, he said, "If I had the money from all the paydays I've missed in the past five years, I'd be a rich man."

LAST OF GROUP

But Bond said he still felt he had many good friends in the organization.

Bond was the last of the "old-timers" to leave SNCC. John Lewis, SNCC chairman, quit several weeks ago after the organization began touting its "black power" slogans.

In an official statement, Bond told Negro radio station WAOK that there were many reasons for his resignation.

"There are things I want to do and SNCC is doing some things I don't want to do," he said. "But primarily it's because I'm 26 years old now and it's time to find out if there's anything I can do and if I can do anything at all."

Bond is seeking reelection to the Georgia House against Malcolm Dean, dean of men at Atlanta University.

He has twice been elected to the House post but has never been seated. The House refused to seat Bond when it convened early this year and refused a second time after he ran again for the post and was reelected right after the last legislative session.

The reason: Bond endorsed SNCC statements denouncing U.S. action in Viet Nam as aggression and said he admired the courage of anyone who would burn his draft card. He added, however, that he would not burn his own.

Bond said he also is working on a book.

He said he hopes to become active in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of which he is a member.

Panther Bearded in His Den

Thursday morning a young Snick Black Power leader with a scraggly Castro-type beard on his bronze scowling face, a Black Panther bumper sticker plastered across the front of his sweat shirt, was sitting sullenly in a straight-back chair in a vacant lot in Vine City.

The chair was astride the ashes of what was a Snick booth. Gone up in flames the night before were the beach umbrella, another chair, a table, and stacks of Snick hate pamphlets.

As the young tough sat there amidst the ashes, a white TV cameraman circled, his camera grinding away. The two were alone in the rubble-strewn lot.

You'd think the Klan had struck a righteous blow there. But, no. The sullen Snicker, the weirdo with the beard, is the victim of a new phenomenon on our racial scene. What did him in was a growing black backlash against the senseless, aimless and goalless violence of Snick.

And the Vine City grapevine is humming with an unsettling message. Unsettling to Snick, that is. The message is that Snick is about to be evicted, perhaps forcibly, from the Vine City slums.

The grapevine across town, in the Capitol Avenue-Ormond Street area where a Snick-lashed riot blew the lid off Tuesday, had even more unsettling news. Unsettling to many of the residents there, that is. The word is that Snick wants to move its Atlanta Project headquarters into the Mechanicsville-Summerhill area.

But the welcome mat is not out, even in those slums.

The Capitol-Ormond area has a project of its own going, born in a stormy session Wednesday at the Bethel Baptist Church when about 80 residents gave Snick what amounted to a resounding rasberry.

The project is called the Good Neighbor Club, and already Thursday morning placards bearing the club's name could be seen on houses up and down Capitol Avenue. The club is working on the theory that slum dwellers have a better chance of improving their lot by petitioning their government for redress of grievances.

Working on Capitol Avenue Tuesday morning to recruit members were club chairman Robert McDaniel, a night club entertainer, and club secretary Mrs. Katherine Harris, a car wash girl and Economic Opportunity Atlanta volunteer worker.

They had already run out of "Good Neighbor" placards, but were still signing up members and listing grievances among their neighbors. A few blocks away Snick workers were handing out their hate pamphlets door to door.

It's still quite a tug of war, but signs that the Good Neighbor project may be gaining can be seen in the crumpled Snick pamphlets strewn about in some of the unpaved back streets.

Can Snick be cast out of its own hometown? If it is, can it survive elsewhere?

The answers will come from the success or failure of this group of volunteer Good Neighbors who believe violence is not the way up, but down. And their success or failure will depend a great deal upon the rest of Atlanta, from City Hall, the State Capitol, and yes, the comfortable people who never heard of Summerhill and Mechanicsville and Vine City before this summer.

It will depend on what we're all ready to do in the war on poverty . . . upon whether we want to be good neighbors too.

The Story of Two 'Snicks'

9/9/66

SNCC (Snick) is a story of two organizations.

Today Snick is Stokely Carmichael, publicly saying "By God, I want a little chaos."

Snick now is Carmichael talking of enough violence "to bring this country to its knees."

Snick today is Carmichael saying that when you talk of Black Power, "you are talking about building a movement that will smash everything Western Civilization has created."

The Negro in America, in the new countries in Africa, and wherever he may be, is a part of Western Civilization which a worldwide momentum now is trying to make available to all citizens.

Snick today seeks conflict between races — not peace and an equality of opportunity and political power.

This new Snick has killed off the original Snick — the one that attracted the idealistic college students of both races to share jail, fear, terror, and to work together.

This Snick is no longer a civil rights organization.

Fine Record

No civil rights organization had a finer record of courage, dedication and accomplishment than the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC, Snick) from its inception on the Easter weekend of 1960 at Raleigh, North Carolina, until about mid-1965.

Fine Record

No civil rights organization had a finer record of courage, dedication and accomplishment than the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC, Snick) from its inception on the Easter weekend of 1960 at Raleigh, North Carolina, until about mid-1965.

SNCC captured the idealism and enthusiasm of thousands of students across the nation, Negro and white. The dedication of these idealistic young people is a great chapter in the story of civil rights. They lived in the towns that were brutally dominated by the stereotype sheriffs, deputies, police chiefs, and the total power structure of the towns and counties in which they worked.

Much of what they did was in the presence of danger and unrelenting hatred. Some of both races were killed. SNCC brought hope and courage to many terrorized Negro communities in Mississippi and Alabama. Negro and white, together they endured indignities, degradations, humiliations, and hardships in county and city jails. Young women out of college, Negro and white, were subjected to the most coarse and vulgar treatment by police officers — city and county —in the areas where they went to do a job that was needed.

Their courage was such that they went into the remote counties of Mississippi and Alabama where justice had never been a part of Negro life and where any who sought to change the set-up were greeted with brutality, terror, and, on some occasions, death.

Freedom schools to teach adults some basic reading and writing and to instruct them in civil rights and voting rights, Negro history, and so on, were features of the many activites of the young students, Negro and white.

Few Failures

There were failures and there were instances of irrational leadership. But they were few. In the main, the story of SNCC was magnificent and inspiring.

That was the SNCC — the Snick — that was.

Its decline may be traced to some of the leadership that began to assert itself in late 1964 and into 1965. It was extremely doctrinaire. One of the major leaders developed a semi-paranoid condition. In early 1966, talk of "Havana money" became current. SNCC, unable to meet payrolls, nonetheless could form a front and purchase a $65,000 building.

That a once honorable, idealistic student action group should now be taken over by what amounts to a secret klan-type group which openly states its racial hatreds and its objective to foment disorder and chaos in order to destroy Western civilization is one of the more melancholy stories of our time.

Who Speaks for the Negro?

The Ku Klux Klan fell into disrepute and powerlessness when white people of good will openly condemned its lawless hatred. As long as it could profit from the mystique of "white solidarity," the Klan prospered.

Similarly today, Snick has survived thus far because Negroes have been reluctant to show any disunity in the just cause of equal rights.

White people came to question the value of a white solidarity on terms dictated by the Klan mentality. And so, after this week's disturbances, Atlanta's Negro community is challenging the concept of black power as defined by Snick.

Snick's way has never been the Negro community's way, just as the Klan's way was never the white South's. But both extremist groups could appear the pace-setters as long as they were never disputed by their own people.

It is now encouraging to hear the level-headed positions being taken by leaders and rank-and-file, including high school students, in the Negro community.

Significantly, the Atlanta Summit Leadership Conference, representing a variety of civil rights and economic improvement groups, has pledged itself anew to a positive course of action.

Rioting, a Summit statement observed, "did nothing to correct or to solve any of the problems which the community faces." It concluded that the Summit group would "commit ourselves to greater effort NOW to make Atlanta a city which all people can appreciate, support and hold in high esteem."

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. called riots "socially destructive and self-defeating." But he said it also was "important to condemn the conditions which bring riots into being." The Summit Conference, it should be noted, likewise said: "We believe in demonstrations and in protests."

The white politicians who fail to distinguish between legitimate protest and the anarchy of rioting are as foolish as Negroes who see no difference between nonviolence and Snick's black power.

Snick showed its hand more openly here than perhaps anywhere else in the country. Atlantans—Negro as well as white—didn't like what they saw.

The Negroes Will Choose

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee was born here. It was betrayed here by roughnecks who took it away from students and turned it away from nonviolence. It would be fitting if SNCC died here, as a result of its naked incitement to riot this week in Atlanta.

Let it be suggested, though, that this is a matter the Negro community itself will handle and should handle.

Talk among some white leaders of throwing the book at Stokely Carmichael—insurrection charges and the like— is not wise nor is it necessary; the true judges must be Atlanta's Negroes.

Jim Rankin's column on this page gives a clear picture of the development of that far healthier situation.

Negroes in Atlanta are not children. They are capable of conducting the affairs of their communities sensibly. Their judgments and decisions have been their own for a long time in this city.

They will judge SNCC and decide their course.

The ugliness of Tuesday's riot situation was as obvious to the Negro community as it was to the white. Condemnation of the violence and disorder came as swiftly from the Negro leadership as from the white.

For a much longer time Negroes had been forming their decisions in places like the Vine City slum. The SNCC sound truck was a familiar fixture there. The organizers and the black power pamphlets had been around for months. But Vine City hadn't rioted.

On the contrary, many residents had quietly measured SNCC and found it wanting. After the sound truck moved over to Summerhill Tuesday and the SNCC toughs suckered some people there into the riot, a considerable amount of grass roots grumbling arose in Vine City about its status as an exporter of trouble. And there is serious talk of asking SNCC out of there.

The Summerhill people didn't bow down humbly to the swaggering incivility and intimidation of the SNCC people either. As Rankin reports, they flatly challenged SNCC for leadership of the section and lit a backfire with a nonviolent organization of their own.

All of the leadership groups, from Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s SCLC to the comprehensive Summit Leadership Conference, have forthrightly counseled Atlanta's Negroes against the disorder SNCC initiated. But at the ground level, in the streets, the most important work was being done. It appeared to be a work of independence by responsible people who are not afraid of SNCC.

So, let the white leadership labor to strengthen the responsible Negro leaders by working fairly to meet the legitimate needs of the Negro people here. Those people are capable of dealing with SNCC, and Atlanta is blessed with signs that they will as true Negro leaders now emerge.

Snick Asks U.S. Court To Rule State's Laws Against Riots Illegal

Also Wants The Mayor Enjoined

By BILL SHIPP

Stokely Carmichael and Snick late Friday asked the federal court to declare unconstitutional Georgia's anti-riot and insurrection laws and the city's disorderly conduct ordinance.

A suit, filed on behalf of the Black Power leader and his organization, asked that a three-judge panel be appointed immediately to hear the case.

The petition called for a permanent injunction to be issued against Mayor Ivan Allen and other officials to restrain them from "impeding, intimidating, hindering" Snick members in exercising their rights.

IN FULTON JAIL

Carmichael was in Fulton County jail Friday in lieu of $10,000 bond on charges of inciting Tuesday's riot which left 15 persons injured here. Seventy-three persons were arrested during the riot. Carmichael was arrested late Thursday in a raid on the Nelson Street headquarters of the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee.

If the court grants Snick's request, Carmichael and other members would be relieved of all charges against them.

The Fulton County grand jury is expected to consider indictments against the 25-year-old native of the British West Indies next Friday.

5 SECTIONS

Specifically, the suit attacks the validity of five Georgia code sections dealing with insurrection, inciting to riot, riot and unlawful assemblies and the city's disorderly conduct ordinance.

It said these statutes are "void and illegal on their face" in that they violate the "fundamental guarantees of free speech, press, assembly, and the right to petition the government for redress of grievances."

ta, general counsel for Snick, filed the suit.

In addition to Allen, other defendants included Fulton Sol. Gen. Lewis Slaton, Atlanta Police Chief Herbert T. Jenkins, Fulton Sheriff T. Ralph Grimes and Capt. Morris Redding, head of the police department's crime prevention bureau.

No hearing has been set.

The petition charged that Allen and the others enter into a "scheme" to "threaten to enforce" the statutes to deprive Snick and its supporters of their rights.

The legal document declared that Snick staff members went into the Summerhill area of Atlanta after a car theft suspect was shot by a policeman. It said Snick was invited there by Negro residents "to assist them to ascertain the facts surrounding" the shooting.

RIGHTS STRESSED

It said Snick members were arrested after they attempted to exercise their rights of free speech, assembly and the right to petition for redress of grievances.

Shortly before the petition was filed, Snick's program coordinator, Cleveland Sellers, issued a fiery statement directed at Mayor Ivan Allen. The statement, read at a press conference, said: "We are not your subjects and we are not afraid of your gestapo police force. We will continue to fight you as long as there is one black person left in the United States."

James Forman, manager of Snick's national office here, charged that Carmichael was being held "a political prisoner." He said Carmichael expected to remain in jail pending grand jury findings.

Carmichael was turned over to Fulton County authorities after he waived preliminary hearing in Municipal Court. He arrived at Fulton County jail with a stack of books and $6 in his pocket. He was placed in an individual cell.

Meanwhile, four Negro leaders told Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. that there were "many innocent people" among those arrested earlier this week in the rioting in Capitol Avenue.

They said they called on the mayor to see what could be done in behalf of those persons whom they said were "innocent."

Mayor Allen conferred privately in his office for about an hour with Ald. Q. V. Williamson; State Sen. Leroy Johnson; Jesse Hill, Jr. and Sam Williams, president of the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

HYSTERIA CITED

The mayor said he agreed with the Negro leaders that many of those arrested Tuesday were simply "caught up in the hysteria" and were "incited by falsehoods and rumors" put out by Snick leaders. But he said it would be "up to the judge" to decide the merits of each case made Tuesday.

Meanwhile, representatives of 14 local organizations, ranging from the American Jewish Committee to the National Council of Churches, signed a letter to Allen which declared:

". . . it would be tragic, indeed, if community consensus were to become arrayed against certain individuals and organizations" as a substitute for relieving the slum area conditions which brought about Tuesday's disorder.

Mayor Allen and other officials have charged that Carmichael and Snick were responsible for the riot.

The letter said: "There has been in our opinion competent criticism of the violence and those who supported it, for no one can countenance violence, the injury of persons and the willful destruction of property."

SIGNERS LISTED

Signers of the letter included representatives of the Southern Regional Council; NAACP, American Friends Service Committee, Georgia Civil Liberties Union, American Jewish Committee, Anti-Defamation League, Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity; National Conference of Christians and Jews, United Presbyterian Church USA.

National Council of Churches, Georgia Council on Human Relations, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, National Urban League, Southern Student Organizing Committee, and Citizens Crusade Against Poverty.

On Negro Separatism

MOVEMENT

By WILLIAM V. SHANNON

In terms of both ideas and political strategy, the civil rights movement has reached a critical stage.

Stokely Carmichael of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has raised the provocative slogan "black power" and seems bent on transforming the civil rights movement into a purely Negro movement in which "whitey" will be the new second-class citizen.

This has divided the Negro radicals and their white sympathizers from the more sophisticated leaders of the larger, better-established organizations such as Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Pressure on Leaders

These leaders, who believe in integration as an ideal and in cooperation with whites as the only practical strategy, are themselves under intensified pressure to prove that practical politics in coalition with whites actually brings results. The preoccupation of the Johnson Administration with the war in Vietnam rather than the war on poverty harms them, and so does the poor progress of the civil rights bill in the Senate.

Bayard Rustin, one of the chief Negro theorists of the coalition viewpoint, felt constrained to remind the readers of Commentary magazine this month that despite the great legislative and juridical victories for civil rights over the past dozen years, "Negroes today are in worse economic shape, live in worse slums and attend more highly segregated schools than in 1954."

"More Negroes are unemployed today than in 1954; the gap between the wages of the Negro worker and the white worker is wider; while the unemployment rate among white youths is decreasing, the rate among Negro youths has increased to 32 per cent," Mr. Rustin wrote.

Under these circumstances, radicalism of the Stokely Carmichael variety naturally finds an audience in the Negro ghettos. But this radicalism and the furor over "black power" have almost paralyzed many politicians who are fearful that a white backlash vote may develop against them in November if they push too actively for programs that help Negroes, such as open occupancy in housing and the war on poverty.

The Immigrant Thesis

Meanwhile, some white intellectuals have advanced the theory that the Negroes coming to the Northern cities from the impoverished rural South are not really so different, after all, from the European immigrants of the past century. The crisis of the cities and the social disorganization of Negro families are not, it is suggested, so strikingly new as most people have thought.

Although an enhanced sense of historical perspective is always welcome, it is surely the differences rather than the similarities between the European immigrants and the Negroes that matter. In past generations, when a successful immigrant moved into a new and better neighborhood, his children might at first be snubbed at parties or suffer other social slights, but few neighbors were gripped by the panicky impulse to sell their house, before more of "them" moved in and property values fell. The sexual fantasies and hysterical fears that complicate racial problems did not exist or, at least, not with the same intensity for ethnic minorities.

Many Negroes who do not share Stokely Carmichael's romanticism or confused revolutionary fervor have nevertheless been taking a fresh look at the inevitable limits of integration and at the positive possibilities of revitalizing the big city ghettos. Livingston Wingate, executive director of Haryou-Act, the Harlem antipoverty agency, has said what few Negro leaders would have said until very recently and that is that no amount of busing is likely to bring integrated schooling for most of New York's Negro children. It is more important to upgrade the quality of those schools than to worry about integration, he argues.

Dr. Thomas W. Matthew, a Negro neurosurgeon, has organized the National Economic Growth and Reconstruction Organization (NEGRO), which hopes to develop self-help and self-employment programs in Negro neighborhoods. It is odd to think of Harlem as a slum, Dr. Matthew contends, when its central location in Manhattan could make it a fantastically valuable stretch of real estate. He and other little-known Negro leaders around the country are striving in different ways to shape the separatist impulse behind the "black power" slogan into constructive channels.

They recognize that although individual Negroes, like white immigrants of past generations, are climbing to success, their individual triumphs do not transform or even importantly alleviate the lives of the impoverished Negroes left behind in the ghettos.

By Their Own Efforts

If Harlem and similar neighborhoods are to be transformed, Negroes have to do it themselves by their own efforts. A man can only respect other people when he first respects and has confidence in himself. Jobs and locally-run community action programs are essential in achieving that self-respect and confidence.

But since Negro America, like an underdeveloped foreign country, needs investment capital and technical assistance, Negroes in the slums can work out their own salvation only with the economic and political cooperation of the larger society. There is no separate black path to power and fulfillment that does not intersect with many white routes in this interdependent nation.

Power, Yes-- To Destroy

"This country does not function by morality, love and nonviolence, but by power."—Stokely Carmichael. Thus at one sweep he brushes aside nonviolence, love and morality as components of power. They happened to have been the main components of the power that wrought a racial revolution over the last decade. But to Carmichael, that wasn't power enough.

The young Negro wants "black power." And what is that? At this point he begins to sound severely confused: "The white man is irrelevant to blacks . . . The rebuilding of this society, if at all possible, is basically the responsibility of whites . . . As for initiating the use of violence, we hope that such programs as ours will make that unnecessary; but it is not for us to tell black communities whether they can or cannot use any particular form of action to resolve their problems."

Carmichael wanders even further along this twisted path. Even if Negroes initiate violence, he says, responsibility for it lies not with them but with whites. "That man who goes out and throws a brick at a white cop is taking part in an uprising as Crispus Attucks, another black man, was . . . in the American Revolution."

And so forth. Apologists to the contrary, it spells violence, race hatred and anarchy. Are these the components of power in this country? They obviously are not, and the proof is now present.

The civil rights bill of 1966 is dead and little mourned. Civil rights bills were passed when nonviolence was the motive force of Negro power.

More than that, the country's reaction to Negro needs generally has changed since Watts. As Gene Roberts wrote this week in a New York Times survey of the civil rights movement nationally, "Public support for the Negro and his problems is waning, white opposition is growing, and the civil rights movement is falling into disarray."

Far more than a civil rights bill is being lost in the name of "black power." It is foolishness and folly, as the adult Negro leadership has tried to tell its masses. But a few demagogues can recruit savage mobs; Negro demagogues did it as effectively in Summerhill and on Boulevard as white bullies did it in Grenada.

They also can dazzle the inexperienced or the unknowing; witness campus enthusiasm for Carmichael that rivals poor white belief in Lester Maddox.

But impatience and anger can't alter reality for either race. Black power is no power, just as white supremacy was weakness. When the traders on emotion have fretted their hour and gone away, that fact will remain in the wreckage.

Black Power Gained Little In Rights Vote, Leaders Say

MOVEMENT AC 9/25/66

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24—Black power advocates haven't gained much ground among Negroes embittered over the defeat of the 1966 civil rights bill—but responsible Negro leaders may have lost some.

That was the way moderate civil rights leaders in the nation's capital this weekend were assessing the effects the death of the controversial measure would have within the Negro community.

Minutes after a second cloture vote failed last week, Senate sponsors of the bill predicted its defeat would open up a "new element of danger"——the possibility that Negroes would turn to black power for revenge.

"Certainly," said National Urban League Director Whitney Young, "the fact that the bill was defeated gives more credence and validity to extremist statements."

The man-on-the-street in Negro communities, said Young, will probably be full of despair and hopelessness. "He sits there like a volcano: Given the incident, he may explode."

JUST THE same, Young agreed with NAACP Washington Director Clarence Mitchell's appraisal that the overwhelming majority of American Negroes won't turn to black power.

"I don't think they'll start throwing bricks," Mitchell said in an interview here. "The people who throw bricks probably don't care what goes on in Congress—they'd probably be out throwing bricks anyway."

But, added Young cryptically: "The death of the bill makes it more difficult for those of us who try to be responsible to maintain our influence as civil rights leaders. People want to know what rewards being moderate will get us."

Young and Mitchell — and other responsible civil rights leaders — generally predict that Negroes disappointed over the failure of the civil rights bill are more likely to take out their frustrations in the voting booths than on the streets.

SEVERAL civil rights organizations, especially in congressional districts where Negroes constitute a big "swing" vote, are already preparing strong campaigns against congressmen who voted against the 1966 measure.

Expectedly, Negro leaders also see a strengthening of civil rights activity in the North.

The 1966 bill, with its controversial open-housing provision, was the first to have its greatest potential effect outside the South. Its defeat, some say, was as much due to Northern reluctance as Southern opposition.

"We've already had our confrontation in the South," said one civil rights leader privately. "And, in terms of gain, there's been much more progress there than in the big Northern cities.

"Look at Atlanta," he said, by way of example. "In five years, Atlanta will probably be one of the most liberal cities in the nation with regard to civil rights.

"We're not going to ignore the South," he continued. "We're just not going to ignore the North, either."

Still, says William L. Taylor, staff director for the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, the defeat of the bill "won't change the position" of the civil rights leadership.

THE BILL, says Taylor, "wouldn't have had a great deal to give ghetto Negroes — but its loss will mean a lot, anyway."

"Its main effect now will be psychological," Taylor said. "There's no question that effect will be adverse."

To most whites, there's no question that recent black power demonstrations — in Atlanta and other U.S. cities — caused a white backlash that contributed to the bill's defeat.

"The death of the bill is undeniable evidence," says Atlanta Rep. Charles L. Weltner, the only Georgian to vote for the measure, "that the people of the United States are not going to suffer organized violence under the guise of civil rights.

"For those genuinely interested in expanding opportunities," the congressman said, "it ought to be compelling persuasion that black power advocates must be repudiated."

BUT YOUNG, for one, finds that a tough position to accept.

"The news media," he said, "built these isolated black power riots into a Frankenstein, and then asked the Negro leadership 'Why can't you control it?'

"For every Negro who participates in a riot," Young said, "100 die in Viet Nam. The 97 per cent of the Negroes who have remained non-violent are being penalized for the actions of a few. The Negro community, unlike others, is being asked to be 100 per cent pure."

At week's end, most civil rights leaders were agreeing that the death of the bill hadn't changed the 97 per cent or the remaining 3 per cent.

Said Taylor stoically: "The problems just aren't going to go away by themselves."

"BLACK POWER" AND COALITION POLITICS

"BLACK POWER" AND COALITION POLITICS

BAYARD RUSTIN

THERE are two Americas—black and white—and nothing has more clearly revealed the divisions between them than the debate currently raging around the slogan of "black power." Despite—or perhaps because of—the fact that this slogan lacks any clear definition, it has succeeded in galvanizing emotions on all sides, with many whites seeing it as the expression of a new racism and many Negroes taking it as a warning to white people that Negroes will no longer tolerate brutality and violence. But even within the Negro community itself, "black power" has touched off a major debate—the most bitter the community has experienced since the days of Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois, and one which threatens to ravage the entire civil-rights movement. Indeed, a serious split has already developed between advocates of "black power" like Floyd McKissick of CORE and Stokely Carmichael of SNCC on the one hand, and Dr. Martin Luther King of SCLC, Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, and Whitney Young of the Urban League on the other.

There is no question, then, that great passions are involved in the debate over the idea of "black power"; nor, as we shall see, is there any question that these passions have their roots in the psychological and political frustrations of the Negro community. Nevertheless, I would contend that "black power" not only lacks any real value for the civil-rights movement, but that its propagation is positively harmful. It diverts the movement from a meaningful debate over strategy and tactics, it isolates the Negro community, and it encourages the growth of anti-Negro forces.

In its simplest and most innocent guise, "black power" merely means the effort to elect Negroes to office in proportion to Negro strength within the population. There is, of course, nothing wrong with such an objective in itself, and nothing inherently radical in the idea of pursuing it. But in Stokely Carmichael's extravagant rhetoric about "taking over" in districts of the South where Negroes are in the majority, it is important to recognize that Southern Negroes are only in a position to win a maximum of two congressional seats and control of eighty local counties.* (Carmichael, incidentally, is in the paradoxical position of screaming at liberals—wanting only to "get whitey off my back"—and simultaneously needing their support: after all, he can talk about Negroes taking over Lowndes County only because there is a fairly liberal federal government to protect him should Governor Wallace decide to eliminate this pocket of black power.) Now there might be a certain value in having two Negro congressmen from the South, but obviously they could do nothing by themselves to reconstruct the face of America. Eighty sheriffs, eighty tax assessors, and eighty school-board members might ease the tension for a while in their communities, but they alone could not create jobs and build low-cost housing; they alone could not supply quality integrated education.

The relevant question, moreover, is not whether a politician is black or white, but what forces he represents. Manhattan has had a succession of Negro borough presidents, and yet the schools are increasingly segregated. Adam Clayton Powell and William Dawson have both been in Congress for many years; the former is responsible for a rider on school intergration that never gets passed, and the latter is responsible for keeping the Negroes of Chicago tied to a mayor who had to see riots and death before he would put eight-dollar sprinklers on water hydrants in the summer. I am not for one minute arguing that Powell, Dawson, and Mrs. Motley should be impeached. What I am saying is that if a politician is elected because he is black and is deemed to be entitled to a "slice of the pie," he will behave in one way; if he is elected by a constituency pressing for social reform, he will, whether he is white or black, behave in another way.

SOUTHERN Negroes, despite exhortations from SNCC to organize themselves into a Black Panther party, are going to stay in the Democratic party—to them it is the party of progress, the New Deal, the New Frontier, and the Great Society—and they are right to stay. For SNCC's Black Panther perspective is simultaneously utopian and reactionary—the former for the by now obvious reason that one-tenth of the population cannot accomplish much by itself, the latter because such a party would remove Negroes from the main area of political struggle in this country (particularly in the one-party South, where the decisive battles are fought out in Democratic primaries), and would give priority to the issue of race precisely at a time when the fundamental questions facing the Negro and American society alike are economic and social. It is no accident that the two main proponents of "black power," Carmichael and McKissick, should now be co-sponsoring a conference with Adam Clayton Powell and Elijah Muhammad, and that the leaders of New York CORE should recently have supported the machine candidate for Surrogate—because he was the choice of a Negro boss—rather than the candidate of the reform movement. By contrast, Martin Luther King is working in Chicago with the Industrial Union Department of the AFL-CIO and with religious groups in a coalition which, if successful, will mean the end or at least the weakening of the Daley-Dawson machine.

The winning of the right of Negroes to vote in the South insures the eventual transformation of the Democratic party, now controlled primarily by Northern machine politicians and Southern Dixiecrats. The Negro vote will eliminate the Dixiecrats from the party and from Congress, which means that the crucial question facing us today is who will replace them in the South. Unless civil-rights leaders (in such towns as Jackson, Mississippi; Birmingham, Alabama; and even to a certain extent Atlanta) can organize grass-roots clubs whose members will have a genuine political voice, the Dixiecrats might well be succeeded by black moderates and black Southern-style machine politicians, who would do little to push for needed legislation in Congress and little to improve local conditions in the South. While I myself would prefer Negro machines to a situation in which Negroes have no power at all, it seems to me that there is a better alternative today—a liberal-labor-civil rights coalition which would work to make the Democratic party truly responsive to the aspirations of the poor, and which would develop support for programs (specifically those outlined in A. Philip Randolph's $100 billion Freedom Budget) aimed at the reconstruction of American society in the interests of greater social justice. The advocates of "black power" have no such programs in mind; what they are in fact arguing for (perhaps unconsciously) is the creation of a new black establishment.

Nor, it might be added, are they leading the Negro people along the same road which they imagine immigrant groups traveled so successfully in the past. Proponents of "black power"—accepting a historical myth perpetrated by moderates—like to say that the Irish and the Jews and the Italians, by sticking together and demanding their share, finally won enough power to overcome their initial disabilities. But the truth is that it was through alliances with other groups (in political machines or as part of the trade-union movement) that the Irish and the Jews and the Italians acquired the power to win their rightful place in American society. They did not "pull themselves up by their own bootstraps"—no group in American society has ever done so; and they most certainly did not make isolation their primary tactic.

IN SOME quarters, "black power" connotes not an effort to increase the number of Negroes in elective office but rather a repudiation of non-violence in favor of Negro "self-defense." Actually this is a false issue, since no one has ever argued that Negroes should not defend themselves as individuals from attack.* Non-violence has been advocated as a tactic for organized demonstrations in a society where Negroes are a minority and where the majority controls the police. Proponents of non-violence do not, for example, deny that James Meredith has the right to carry a gun for protection when he visits his mother in Mississippi; what they question is the wisdom of his carrying a gun while participating in a demonstration.

There is, as well, a tactical side to the new emphasis on "self-defense" and the suggestion that non-violence be abandoned. The reasoning here is that turning the other cheek is not the way to win respect, and that only if the Negro succeeds in frightening the white man will the white man begin taking him seriously. The trouble with this reasoning is that it fails to recognize that fear is more likely to bring hostility to the surface than respect; and far from prodding the "white power structure" into action, the new militant leadership, by raising the slogan of black power and lowering the banner of non-violence, has obscured the moral issue facing this nation, and permitted the President and Vice President to lecture us about "racism in reverse" instead of proposing more meaningful programs for dealing with the problems of unemployment, housing, and education.

"Black power" is, of course, a somewhat nationalistic slogan and its sudden rise to popularity among Negroes signifies a concomitant rise in nationalist sentiment (Malcolm X's autobiography is quoted nowadays in Grenada, Mississippi as well as in Harlem). We have seen such nationalistic turns and withdrawals back into the ghetto before, and when we look at the conditions which brought them about, we find that they have much in common with the conditions of Negro life at the present moment: conditions which lead to despair over the goal of integration and to the belief that the ghetto will last forever.

It may, in the light of the many juridical and legislative victories which have been achieved in the past few years, seem strange that despair should be so widespread among Negroes today. But anyone to whom it seems strange should reflect on the fact that despite these victories Negroes today are in worse economic shape, live in worse slums, and attend more highly segregated schools than in 1954. Thus—to recite the appalling, and appallingly familiar, statistical litany once again—more Negroes are unemployed today than in 1954; the gap between the wages of the Negro worker and the white worker is wider; while the unemployment rate among white youths is decreasing, the rate among Negro youths has increased to 32 per cent (and among Negro girls the rise is even more startling). Even the one gain which has been registered, a decrease in the unemployment rate among Negro adults, is deceptive, for it represents men who have been called back to work after a period of being laid off. In any event, unemployment among Negro men is still twice that of whites, and no new jobs have been created.

So too with housing, which is deteriorating in the North (and yet the housing provisions of the 1966 civil-rights bill are weaker than the anti-discrimination laws in several states which contain the worst ghettos even with these laws on their books). And so too with schools: according to figures issued recently by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, 65 per cent of first-grade Negro students in this country attend schools that are from 90 to 100 per cent black. (If in 1954, when the Supreme Court handed down the desegregation decision, you had been the Negro parent of a first-grade child, the chances are that this past June you would have attended that child's graduation from a segregated high school.)

To put all this in the simplest and most concrete terms: the day-to-day lot of the ghetto Negro has not been improved by the various judicial and legislative measures of the past decade.

NEGROES are thus in a situation similar to that of the turn of the century, when Booker T. Washington advised them to "cast down their buckets" (that is to say, accommodate to segregation and disenfranchisement) and when even his leading opponent, W. E. B. Du Bois, was forced to advocate the development of a group economy in place of the direct-action boycotts, general strikes, and protest techniques which had been used in the 1880's, before the enactment of the Jim-Crow laws. For all their differences, both Washington and Du Bois then found it impossible to believe that Negroes could ever be integrated into American society, and each in his own way therefore counseled withdrawal into the ghetto, self-help, and economic self-determination.

World War I aroused new hope in Negroes that the rights removed at the turn of the century would be restored. More than 360,000 Negroes entered military service and went overseas; many left the South seeking the good life in the North and hoping to share in the temporary prosperity created by the war. But all these hopes were quickly smashed at the end of the fighting. In the first year following the war, more than seventy Negroes were lynched, and during the last six months of that year, there were some twenty-four riots throughout America. White mobs took over whole cities, flogging, burning, shooting, and torturing at will, and when Negroes tried to defend themselves, the violence only increased. Along with this, Negroes were excluded from unions and pushed out of jobs they had won during the war, including federal jobs.

In the course of this period of dashed hope and spreading segregation—the same period, incidentally, when a reorganized Ku Klux Klan was achieving a membership which was to reach into the millions—the largest mass movement ever to take root among working-class Negroes, Marcus Garvey's "Back to Africa" movement, was born. "Buy Black" became a slogan in the ghettos; faith in integration was virtually snuffed out in the Negro community until the 1930's when the CIO reawakened the old dream of a Negro-labor alliance by announcing a policy of non-discrimination and when the New Deal admitted Negroes into relief programs, WPA jobs, and public housing. No sooner did jobs begin to open up and Negroes begin to be welcomed into mainstream organizations than "Buy Black" campaigns gave way to "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work" movements. A. Philip Randolph was able to organize a massive March on Washington demanding a wartime FEPC; CORE was born and with it the non-violent sit-in technique; the NAACP succeeded in putting an end to the white primaries in 1944. Altogether, World War II was a period of hope for Negroes, and the economic progress they made through wartime industry continued steadily until about 1948 and remained stable for a time. Meanwhile, the non-violent movement of the 1950's and 60's achieved the desegregation of public accommodations and established the right to vote.

Yet at the end of this long fight, the Southern Negro is too poor to use those integrated facilities and too intimidated and disorganized to use the vote to maximum advantage, while the economic position of the Northern Negro deteriorates rapidly.

The promise of meaningful work and decent wages once held out by the anti-poverty programs has not been fulfilled. Because there has been a lack of the necessary funds, the program has in many cases been reduced to wrangling for positions on boards or for lucrative staff jobs. Negro professionals working for the program have earned handsome salaries—ranging from $14- to $25,000—while young boys have been asked to plant trees at $1.25 an hour. Nor have the Job Corps camps made a significant dent in unemployment among Negro youths; indeed, the main beneficiaries of this program seem to be the private companies who are contracted to set up the camps.

THEN there is the war in Vietnam, which poses many ironies for the Negro community. On the one hand, Negroes are bitterly aware of the fact that more and more money is being spent on the war, while the anti-poverty program is being cut; on the other hand, Negro youths are enlisting in great numbers, as though to say that it is worth the risk of being killed to learn a trade, to leave a dead-end situation, and to join the only institution in this society which seems really to be integrated.

The youths who rioted in Watts, Cleveland, Omaha, Chicago, and Portland are the members of a truly hopeless and lost generation. They can see the alien world of affluence unfold before them on the TV screen. But they have already failed in their inferior segregated schools. Their grandfathers were sharecroppers, their grandmothers were domestics, and their mothers are domestics too. Many have never met their fathers. Mistreated by the local storekeeper, suspected by the policeman on the beat, disliked by their teachers, they cannot stand more failures and would rather retreat into the world of heroin than risk looking for a job downtown or having their friends see them push a rack in the garment district. Floyd McKissick and Stokely Carmichael may accuse Roy Wilkins of being out of touch with the Negro ghetto, but nothing more clearly demonstrates their own alienation from ghetto youth than their repeated exhortations to these young men to oppose the Vietnam war when so many of them tragically see it as their only way out. Yet there is no need to labor the significance of the fact that the rice fields of Vietnam and the Green Berets have more to offer a Negro boy than the streets of Mississippi or the towns of Alabama or 125th Street in New York.

The Vietnam war is also partly responsible for the growing disillusion with non-violence among Negroes. The ghetto Negro does not in general ask whether the United States is right or wrong to be in Southeast Asia. He does, however, wonder why he is exhorted to non-violence when the United States has been waging a fantastically brutal war, and it puzzles him to be told that he must turn the other cheek in our own South while we must fight for freedom in South Vietnam.

Thus, as in roughly similar circumstances in the past—circumstances, I repeat, which in the aggregate foster the belief that the ghetto is destined to last forever—Negroes are once again turning to nationalistic slogans, with "black power" affording the same emotional release as "Back to Africa" and "Buy Black" did in earlier periods of frustration and hopelessness. This is not only the case with the ordinary Negro in the ghetto; it is also the case with leaders like McKissick and Carmichael, neither of whom began as a nationalist or was at first cynical about the possibilities of integration.* It took countless beatings and 24 jailings—that, and the absence of strong and continual support from the liberal community—to persuade Carmichael that his earlier faith in coalition politics was mistaken, that nothing was to be gained from working with whites, and that an alliance with the black nationalists was desirable. In the areas of the South where SNCC has been working so nobly, implementatior of the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965 has been slow and ineffective. Negroes in many rural areas cannot walk into the courthouse and register to vote. Despite the voting-rights bill, they must file complaints and the Justice Department must be called to send federal registrars. Nor do children attend integrated schools as a matter of course. There, too, complaints must be filed and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare must be notified. Neither department has been doing an effective job of enforcing the bills. The feeling of isolation increases among SNCC workers as each legislative victory turns out to be only a token victory—significant on the national level, but not affecting the day-to-day lives of Negroes. Carmichael and his colleagues are wrong in refusing to support the 1966 bill, but one can understand why they feel as they do.

It is, in short, the growing conviction that the Negroes cannot win—a conviction with much grounding in experience—which accounts for the new popularity of "black power." So far as the ghetto Negro is concerned, this conviction expresses itself in hostility first toward the people closest to him who have held out the most promise and failed to deliver (Martin Luther King, Roy Wilkins, etc.), then toward those who have proclaimed themselves his friends (the liberals and the labor movement), and finally toward the only oppressors he can see (the local storekeeper and the policeman on the corner). On the leadership level, the conviction that the Negroes cannot win takes other forms, principally the adoption of what I have called a "no-win" policy. Why bother with programs when their enactment results only in "sham"? Why concern ourselves with the image of the movement when nothing significant has been gained for all the sacrifices made by SNCC and CORE? Why compromise with reluctant white allies when nothing of consequence can be achieved anyway? Why indeed have anything to do with whites at all?

*On Carmichael's background, see "Two for SNCC" by Robert Penn Warren in the April 1965 COMMENTARY—ED.

On this last point, it is extremely important for white liberals to understand—as, one gathers from their references to "racism in reverse," the President and the Vice President of the United States do not—that there is all the difference in the world between saying, "If you don't want me, I don't want you" (which is what some proponents of "black power" have in effect been saying) and the statement, "Whatever you do, I don't want you" (which is what racism declares). It is, in other words, both absurd and immoral to equate the despairing response of the victim with the contemptuous assertion of the oppressor. It would, moreover, be tragic if white liberals allowed verbal hostility on the part of Negroes to drive them out of the movement or to curtail their support for civil rights. The issue was injustice before "black power" became popular, and the issue is still injustice.

In any event, even if "black power" had not emerged as a slogan, problems would have arisen in the relation between whites and Negroes in the civil-rights movement. In the North, it was inevitable that Negroes would eventually wish to run their own movement and would rebel against the presence of whites in positions of leadership as yet another sign of white supremacy. In the South, the well-intentioned white volunteer had the cards stacked against him from the beginning. Not only could he leave the struggle any time he chose to do so, but a higher value was set on his safety by the press and the government—apparent in the differing degrees of excitement generated by the imprisonment or murder of whites and Negroes. The white person's importance to the movement in the South was thus an ironic outgrowth of racism and was therefore bound to create resentment.

But again: however understandable all this may be as a response to objective conditions and to the seeming irrelevance of so many hard-won victories to the day-to-day life of the mass of Negroes, the fact remains that the quasi-nationalist sentiments and "no-win" policy lying behind the slogan of "black power" do no service to the Negro. Some nationalist emotion is, of course, inevitable, and "black power" must be seen as part of the psychological rejection of white supremacy, part of the rebellion against the stereotypes which have been ascribed to Negroes for three hundred years. Nevertheless, pride, confidence, and a new identity cannot be won by glorifying blackness or attacking whites; they can only come from meaningful action, from good jobs, and from real victories such as were achieved on the streets of Montgomery, Birmingham, and Selma. When SNCC and CORE went into the South, they awakened the country, but now they emerge isolated and demoralized, shouting a slogan that may afford a momentary satisfaction but that is calculated to destroy them and their movement. Already their frustrated call is being answered with counter-demands for law and order and with opposition to police-review boards. Already they have diverted the entire civil-rights movement from the hard task of developing strategies to realign the major parties of this country, and embroiled it in a debate that can only lead more and more to politics by frustration.

On the other side, however—the more important side, let it be said—it is the business of those who reject the negative aspects of "black power" not to preach but to act. Some weeks ago President Johnson, speaking at Fort Campbell, Kentucky, asserted that riots impeded reform, created fear, and antagonized the Negro's traditional friends. Mr. Johnson, according to the New York Times, expressed sympathy for the plight of the poor, the jobless, and the ill-housed. The government, he noted, has been working to relieve their circumstances, but "all this takes time."

One cannot argue with the President's position that riots are destructive or that they frighten away allies. Nor can one find fault with his sympathy for the plight of the poor; surely the poor need sympathy. But one can question whether the government has been working seriously enough to eliminate the conditions which lead to frustration-politics and riots. The President's very words, "all this takes time," will be understood by the poor for precisely what they are—an excuse instead of a real program, a cover-up for the failure to establish real priorities, and an indication that the administration has no real commitment to create new jobs, better housing, and integrated schools.

For the truth is that it need only take ten years to eliminate poverty—ten years and the $100 billion Freedom Budget recently proposed by A. Philip Randolph. In his introduction to the budget (which was drawn up in consultation with the nation's leading economists, and which will be published later this month), Mr. Randolph points out: "The programs urged in the Freedom Budget attack all of the major causes of poverty—unemployment and underemployment, substandard pay, inadequate social insurance and welfare payments to those who cannot or should not be employed; bad housing; deficiencies in health services, education, and training; and fiscal and monetary policies which tend to redistribute income regressively rather than progressively. The Freedom Budget leaves no room for discrimination in any form because its programs are addressed to all who need more opportunity and improved incomes and living standards, not to just some of them."

The legislative precedent Mr. Randolph has in mind is the 1945 Full Employment bill. This bill —conceived in its original form by Roosevelt to prevent a postwar depression—would have made it public policy for the government to step in if the private economy could not provide enough employment. As passed finally by Congress in 1946, with many of its teeth removed, the bill had the result of preventing the Negro worker, who had finally reached a pay level about 55 per cent that of the white wage, from making any further progress in closing that discriminatory gap; and instead, he was pushed back by the chronically high unemployment rates of the 50's. Had the original bill been passed, the public sector of our economy would have been able to insure fair and full employment. Today, with the spiralling thrust of automation, it is even more imperative that we have a legally binding commitment to this goal.

Let me interject a word here to those who say that Negroes are asking for another handout and are refusing to help themselves. From the end of the 19th century up to the last generation, the United States absorbed and provided economic opportunity for tens of millions of immigrants. These people were usually uneducated and a good many could not speak English. They had nothing but their hard work to offer and they labored long hours, often in miserable sweatshops and unsafe mines. Yet in a burgeoning economy with a need for unskilled labor, they were able to find jobs, and as industrialization proceeded, they were gradually able to move up the ladder to greater skills. Negroes who have been driven off the farm into a city life for which they are not prepared and who have entered an economy in which there is less and less need for unskilled labor, cannot be compared with these immigrants of old. The tenements which were jammed by newcomers were way-stations of hope; the ghettos of today have become dead-ends of despair. Yet just as the older generation of immigrants—in its most decisive act of self-help—organized the trade-union movement and then in alliance with many middle-class elements went on to improve its own lot and the condition of American society generally, so the Negro of today is struggling to go beyond the gains of the past and, in alliance with liberals and labor, to guarantee full and fair employment to all Americans.

Mr. Randolph's Freedom Budget not only rests on the Employment Act of 1946, but on a precedent set by Harry Truman when he believed freedom was threatened in Europe. In 1947, the Marshall Plan was put into effect and 3 per cent of the gross national product was spent in foreign aid. If we were to allocate a similar proportion of our GNP to destroy the economic and social consequences of racism and poverty at home today, it might mean spending more than 20 billion dollars a year, although I think it quite possible that we can fulfill these goals with a much smaller sum. It would be intolerable, however, if our plan for domestic social reform were less audacious and less far-reaching than our international programs of a generation ago.

We must see, therefore, in the current debate over "black power," a fantastic challenge to American society to live up to its proclaimed principles in the area of race by transforming itself so that all men may live equally and under justice. We must see to it that in rejecting "black power," we do not also reject the principle of Negro equality. Those people who would use the current debate and/or the riots to abandon the civil-rights movement leave us no choice but to question their original motivation.

If anything, the next period will be more serious and difficult than the preceding ones. It is much easier to establish the Negro's right to sit at a Woolworth's counter than to fight for an integrated community. It takes very little imagination to understand that the Negro should have the right to vote, but it demands much creativity, patience, and political stamina to plan, develop, and implement programs and priorities. It is one thing to organize sentiment behind laws that do not disturb consensus politics, and quite another to win battles for the redistribution of wealth. Many people who marched in Selma are not prepared to support a bill for a $2.00 minimum wage, to say nothing of supporting a redefinition of work or a guaranteed annual income.

It is here that we who advocate coalitions and integration and who object to the "black-power" concept have a massive job to do. We must see to it that the liberal-labor-civil rights coalition is maintained and, indeed, strengthened so that it can fight effectively for a Freedom Budget. We are responsible for the growth of the "black-power" concept because we have not used our own power to insure the full implementation of the bills whose passage we were strong enough to win, and we have not mounted the necessary campaign for winning a decent minimum wage and extended benefits. "Black power" is a slogan directed primarily against liberals by those who once counted liberals among their closest friends. It is up to the liberal movement to prove that coalition and integration are better alternatives.

SNCC Has Money Trouble; Carmichael Blames Others

MOVEMENT

10/2/66 AC

By WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) has been in such a financial squeeze since rioting here that its chairman, Stokely Carmichael, says he is not receiving any pay.

The black power advocate, making this statement to a three-judge federal court here Saturday, said fund-raising efforts throughout the country have been hurt severely.

He attributed arrests of SNCC personnel, statements by Mayor Ivan Allen blaming Sept. 6 rioting on SNCC, and unfavorable press reports as factors causing the organization's difficulties.

TESTIMONY during the three - day hearing indicated that other SNCC workers are not asking for their pay as a result of the economic slump.

Mr. Carmichael made his statement Saturday in the final day of a hearing which began here Thursday. He is charging that Georgia's riot laws are unconstitutional and city and county officials schemed to get him indicted in county court on riot charges.

The SNCC chairman said there was an overall scheme to discredit him and his organization, and this served to squelch his right of free speech.

U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge Elbert P. Tuttle and U.S. District Judges Frank A. Hooper and Sidney O. Smith Jr. took the matter under advisement.

MR. CARMICHAEL, who testified for 45 minutes, admitted he was present during the Sept. 6 riot but denied he had anything to do with it.

He volunteered, however, that a newsman had asked him for a statement over a local radio station concerning a white policeman's shooting of a fleeing Negro youth charged with auto theft.

He said he told the radio audience Negroes were going to meet in the Summerhill area at 4 p.m. and organize a protest demonstration that would "tear this town up."

He told the court that Negroes "need to stand up" for their rights and show white people they are "not contented . . . and eating watermelon."

He said he believes part of the problem is that Negroes are afraid to stand up for their rights.

On cross examination, he said that the expression "tear this town up" has a different meaning to Negroes than what whites may think it means. He said he was speaking of a protest demonstration.

HE SAID he was at the riot scene only six minutes, saw there was nothing he could do to stop it, and left the area. During the hearing, a number of witnesses said SNCC personnel and Mr. Carmichael had nothing to do with the rioting.

Mr. Carmichael testified that as a result of a bad press, threating telephone calls have been plaguing SNCC.

City Detective D. E. Brown said a SNCC worker, Fay Bellamy, was running through the crowd shouting profanity and was calling Mayor Ivan Allen "whitey." She has denied this.

City and county officials have denied they made it a point to single out Mr. Carmichael and SNCC members for prosecution, and said there was no scheme to "scapegoat" anyone.

POLICE officers testified they considered they have sufficient evidence to bring cases against the persons they charged with rioting and disorderly conduct.

SNCC is asking that insurrection laws, in addition to the disorderly conduct and rioting laws, be ruled unconstitutional because they are not definable.

City and county attorneys said prior decisions by Georgia courts have defined the meanings of such acts.

Dr. King Weighing Plan to Repudiate 'Black Power' Bloc

10/10/66

MOVEMENT

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Oct. 9—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said today that he would meet with top advisers this week to decide whether to repudiate and oppose all "black power" organizations.

This action, if it comes, would be a major step toward fashioning a new national civil rghts coalition that would operate with out such black power oriented organizations as the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality.

Integration Is Stressed

Already, a move is under way by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Urban League, and the A. Philip Randolph Institute and Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference to unit around a "manifesto" opposing racial separatism and reaffirming racial integration as the major goal of the civil rights movement.

Dr. John Morsell, assistant national director of the N.A.A.C.P., confirmed that talks were under way among these organizations, but declined to go into specifics

For Dr. King even to consider joining in a movement that might ultimately isolate CORE and the Student Committee is a major departure for him and underlines his concern over white "backlash" and recent civil rights reversals in Congress.

He has said frequently that he opposes the black power philosophy, but that the civil rights movement needs a diversity of organizations—including the Student Committee and CORE.

In an interview here today, however, he said he felt there was now a need to decide whether the philosophies of his Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the black power organizations "are so diametrically opposed that we can't get together."

He said he and his top aides and advisers would try to reach a decision on this question on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of this week, when he has scheduled a closed meeting to discuss ways of combating a new wave of white backlash.

Does this mean, he was asked, that he will consider starting a campaign of opposition to Snick and CORE in isolating them from the "mainstream" of the civil rights movement.

"Yes," he said, "it does."

But he added that he had agreed only to consider the question with his advisers, and that he had not yet reached a decision.

Some of his advisers and aides, he said, believe that the black power movement is directly responsible for much of the sharp opposition that the civil rights movement has encountered in recent weeks.

But others think, he said, that "black power is being used as an excuse by many white people for the way they felt all along."

Dr. King said a series of "disturbing developments" in recent weeks had prompted him to take another look at black power and the civil rights movement in general.

Developments Are Listed

Among these developments, he said, are the death of the civil rights bill of 1966, the "unfortunate silence of the White House" on civil rights programs in recent months, and segregationist victories in Democratic primaries in Arkansas, Maryland and Georgia.

"We're all concerned," he said, "but I am not as pessimistic as some. If Lester Maddox [who once brandished a pistol in his fight against restaurant desegregation] is elected Governor of Georgia, it may develop more unity among Negroes and white liberals than ever before."

He added, however, that "something must be done" immediately to "galvanize" Negroes and white moderates and liberals around civil rights goals. This is the major reason for calling this week's meeting and for carrying on discussions with civil rights leaders who are opposed to black power.

Dr. King said he was open to new approaches and would insist only that they not include "violence or separatism."

Mr. Morsell said in a telephone interview that much of the recent talks among civil rights leaders had centered on using Mr. Randolph's propo "freedom budget" as a way trying to rally public supp anew for the civil rights mo ment.

The freedom budget p calls for up to $100-billion new Federal spending in an fort to upgrade Negro educa and attack widespread pove among Negroes.

MOVEMENT

King's SCLC Not Expected To Break with Black Power

AC 10/14/66

By DUANE RINER

Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference is expected to shy away from an outright repudiation of the "black power" movement in a public statement Friday at the conclusion of a private two-day SCLC summit meeting in Atlanta.

Sources close to Dr. King indicated Thursday night that the civil rights leader would maintain a conciliatory role in an attempt to keep lines of communication open among warring factions.

The "black power" slogan, first sounded by the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and later adopted as the philosophy of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), will be described by SCLC as an unfortunate and ambiguous phrase which has contributed to a loss of public sympathy with the civil rights movement and setbacks in Congress, the source reported.

SCLC will cite its gains through the use of a non-violent approach and re-affirm its determination to continue along the same course.

New goals also will be listed by SCLC, a spokesman said. Among them will be increased job opportunities for Negro youth, training for both adults and youngsters in an automated society and a continued push for open housing. Poverty will be cited as the "overriding causal effect" of the Negro's plight.

"We're just trying to do a total analysis of the whole situation," said the Rev. Andrew J. Young, an associate of King. "Black power and the white backlash are only a small part of the discussions."

Young said the talks between SCLC leaders and advisers concerned the full scope of the racial struggle "from the Mississippi Delta to Viet Nam."

King and Advisers Debating 'Power'

Asked about a possible condemnation of "black power," Young said: "It's not that kind of a meeting."

King has warned that the new SNCC terminology carries anti-white connotations and is dangerous.

Best known among outside advisers to SCLC attending the two-day meeting is Bayard Rustin of New York, an organizer of the 1963 march on Washington, who recently declared that "CORE is dead and Snick is dying."

Rustin last August described "black power" as "an emotional reaction to 300 years of second class citizenship."

Other non-member SCLC advisers attending include leaders of predominantly Negro labor unions and legal counsel.

What may have been a hint of another agenda topic came from Rustin in an airport meeting with reporters when he said responsible civil rights groups should branch out into assistance to the poverty stricken of both races.

The SCLC conference is one in a series of discussions among leaders of more moderate civil rights organizations following setbacks in Congress and declining support for the entire civil rights movement.

Participating in similar talks have been Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League; A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (AFL-CIO), and Dorothy Height, president of the National Council of Negro Women.

Randolph has indicated a joint "manifesto" disowning black power advocates might soon be issued. The black power slogan was originated during a Mississippi March last June by members of Snick.

King has taken a lighter approach toward black power than other leaders. Wilkins has branded it as "racist" and Randolph has called it "a menace to racial peace and prosperity."

King has continued to advocate non - violence and has warned that the new slogan is "ambiguous" and "gives the impression that we are calling for exclusive power and a kind of black nationalism that does not involve a coalition with whites."

Snick chairman Stokely Carmichael has defined the policy as meaning Negroes must organize to take political or economic power where available.

Those expected to meet with King were James Bevil, northern project director; Mrs. Dorothy Cotton, program director; Dr. Ralph D. Abernathy, SCLC vice president-at-large and treasurer; the Rev. Walter Fauntroy, director of the Washington office of SCLC, and Dr. Lawrence Reddic, SCLC historian and director.

MOVEMENT

SCLC Won't Back Any Candidate

AC 10/16/66

By MARION GAINES

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said Friday that the election of segregationist Lester Maddox as governor of Georgia would not slow down the civil rights movement and could serve the purpose of uniting Negroes and white moderates.

The civil rights leader said at a press conference here that the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), which he heads, will not endorse a candidate in the governor's race.

Arch-segregationist Maddox, the Democratic nominee, is running against conservative Congressman Howard (Bo) Callaway, the Republican entry, in the Nov. 8 general election.

On the prospect of Maddox becoming governor, King asserted that Maddox "cannot stop what we are doing in the civil rights movement."

People who think Maddox can stem the civil rights tide are laboring under "a great delusion," said King.

On another topic, King condemned "connotations of violence and separatism attached to the black power slogan" but stopped short of denouncing the leaders of the "black power" movement.

PLANS CAMPAIGN

King also announced plans for a nationwide campaign — complete with mass demonstrations in major cities — to obtain a guaranteed annual income for the country's poor.

King read a statement at a press conference here defending the "principles of nonviolence and Negro unity with all people of good will" and cautioning against extremism.

He declared that the nonviolent weapons of SCLC were used successfully in "the historic battles of Birmingham, Selma and Montgomery" and had produced "victories" in "head-on confrontations with some of America's worst racists."

BLACK POWER

King held out hopes of keeping communications open with the militant "black power" organizations Stokley Carmichael's Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and Floyd McKissick's Congress of Racial Equality (CORE).

He said both SNCC and CORE "have been great forces in the past in the civil rights movement" and at that time were "committed to non-violence."

"We should continue to try to bring them back to the founding principles" of nonviolence, he said.

He denounced riots as "socially destructive and self-defeating" but defended "nonviolent demonstrations" as a proper method for people to seek redress of grievances.

King's statement came after two days of private consultation with officials of the SCLC.

Answering questions, King said he endorses a statement issued in New York by seven national Negro leaders aimed at repudiating "black power" and affirming integration, by nonviolent means, as a goal.

That statement, which assailed "any strategies of violence," was signed by Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP; Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League; A. Philip Randolph, president of the AFL-CIO Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, and Baynard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

In his statement here, King declared it was "a false assumption that the so-called white backlash is caused by the slogan 'black power.' "

"Actually, the black power slogan has been exploited by the decision-makers to justify resistance to change," he said.

In the nationwide crusade for a guaranteed annual income, King said SCLC will be joined by religious groups, international trade unions, major colleges and universities and other civil rights organizations.

Mass demonstrations to that end, he said, will likely not begin until after the November elections. A logical starting place for them, he said would be in Mississippi, then in major Northern cities and "ultimately in Washington."

MOVEMENT AC 10/21/66

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION,

King Urges Guaranteed $4,000 Income for All

By BILL SHIPP

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. told the Atlanta Junior Chamber of Commerce Thursday that every American family should receive a guaranteed annual income of at least $4,000.

"There's too much money around for anyone to be poor," he said. He said the $4,000 "floor" should be higher for "larger families."

The Nobel Peace Prize winner from Atlanta also said he favored passage of a $2 an hour minimum wage law.

King said a guarantee of employment was not enough, but that every person has "a right" to a liveable income.

King said he believed, in view of the many welfare programs the country now has, that a guaranteed annual wage would mean a savings in the long run.

The civil rights leader devoted most of his talk to more than 400 Jaycees to proposals for abolishing poverty in the U.S.

If the U.S. can spend $24 billion a year to fight a war in Viet Nam, he said, "it seems we can spend billions to put God's children on their feet right here in America."

Returning to the subject of "black power" whose advocates he refused to repudiate last week, King said:

"I don't use the (black power) slogan because it has unfortunate connotations. . . . If black power means black separatism, it is a misguided concept.

"The Negro needs the white man to free him from his fear," King said. "The white man needs the Negro to free him from his guilt."

The Baptist preacher condemned rioting but added, "A riot is the language of the unheard. . . . The summers of riot . . . are caused by the nation's winter of delay."

He said all Americans must work to keep the nation from choas."

Young Deplores Publicity Given Fiery Negro Leaders

NEW YORK, Oct. 22 — Millions of moderate Negroes throughout the nation have become embittered because small groups of militants within the civil rights movement have been heavily publicized. They are particularly apprehensive because they think most whites believe they are interested only in violence and separatism.

This is the worried view of Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League.

THE REASON, Young said: "Dissidents have managed almost completely to dominate public attention and draw it away from the quiet, constructive work of the Negro in his struggle for equality.

"Less than 2 to 3 per cent in the country believe in violence as a way of resolving conflict," Young said in an interview this week assessing progress of the civil rights movement, "most Negroes are upset about riots."

He added:

"Out of 18 million Negroes, 17,990,000 did not throw a Molotov cocktail or shout 'Black Power' or 'Kill Whitey.' What they did was bear in silence their disappointments and frustrations.

"They are being penalized for the few. Less than 2 per cent or 3 per cent have any interest in separatism or going back to Africa. Nobody says Italians have to be penalized because 13 Costa Nostra people were picked up."

YOUNG LEANED back in a chair in his seventh floor office at the Urban League's new Manhattan headquarters. He spoke quietly of the Negro in his speech for equality. He talked deliberately, choosing his phrases with care.

"The press lacks sophistication. You ought to be covering where Negroes move in and whites don't move out.

"At Core's convention in Baltimore (the Congress of Racial Equality national convention this summer) there was a tiny number of delegates but almost twice as many reporters. At the Urban League's convention in August there were 1,500 delegates and less than 30 reporters.

"We weren't talking about 'Black Power,' 'Kill Whitey.' We had participants from the top corporations of the country, had people who employ 10 million workers. We were talking about retraining and job training.

"It's gotten to the point where it's a big joke in Harlem how to get on the front page . . . papers made these 'readers' into a Frankenstein and then say to us: 'Control them.' "

LAST YEAR the Urban League placed 50,000 Negroes in jobs. Its 78 branches — a new one just opened in Jackson, Miss. — are operating with a $1.6 million budget in 1966. Young, 45, dean of the Atlanta University School of Social Work for seven years before coming to the Urban League, turned to housing, another major problem facing the Negro.

"There now needs to be a massive educational program for all people.

"I am now convinced 90 per cent of all white Americans don't know what freedom and democracy are all about. They don't understand responsibilities —that their freedom ends where the other person's begins . . .

"It doesn't matter how much education people have. Ralph Bunche (Negro U.S. undersecretary general) can't move to Cicero. But Al Capone could.

"I think a Communist could come over here and live in Cicero.

"Housing has revealed the prejudcies of the North to be deep and real. There is now a direct correlation between how liberal people are and how far away they are from the problem."

YOUNG turned instead to the need for new maturity and perhaps a new direction within the civil rights movement itself.

"Within the movement a new maturity is needed that understands the opening of doors, the establishment of a right is just one phase of the civil rights struggle.

"It is meaningless unless it is coupled with providing a historically deprived people with the resources to take advantage of the right.

"There's nothing glamorous in getting people to register, going door to door to get people to vote. We, ourselves, have failed to dramatize the less dramatic jobs that have to be done.

"We are having a problem of another kind—liberal whites who, to prove their legitimacy, have to out-militate the most militant Negro. They, too, are calling for Black Power.

185 Billion Freedom Budget Offered to Abolish Poverty

MOVEMENT

AC 10/27/66

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

NEW YORK — A $185 billion "Freedom Budget for all Americans," designed to end poverty in the United States in the next 10 years, was proposed Wednesday by a coalition of national civil rights, religious and labor groups and intellectuals.

Conceived by the veteran civil rights advocate, A. Philip Randolph, the budget funds will be requested from the federal government to extend greatly the operations of existing social, educational and antipoverty programs.

The plan, as outlined at a two-hour conference of civic, labor and religious leaders, is to attack the causes of poverty on several fronts. It seeks a guaranteed annual income, increased welfare and social security payments, full employment, farm income parties, and fully adequate health, housing and educational opportunities for all persons.

The proposal's monetary concepts were worked out by a team of economists headed by Dr. Leon Keyserling, who said it would require neither new taxes nor money earmarked for the war in Viet Nam. Keyserling maintained that the money could come from projected "economic growth dividends" of the nation's Gross National Product for the next 10 years.

An often stressed point during the conference was that the plan, coming out of the civil rights coalition, hopes to improve the lives of more than 34 million Americans in poverty, 75 per cent of whom are white.

"The tragedy is that the workings of our economy so often pit the white poor and the black poor against each other at the bottom of society," Randolph told the group.

The 77-year-old head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters said: "We cannot achieve these goals (ending poverty) through haphazard, piecemeal efforts . . . for better or worse, we are one nation and one people. We shall solve our are problems together or together we shall enter a new era of social disorder and disintegration."

Randolph also said that "not since the march on Washington has there been such broad sponsorship and enthusiastic support as has been mobilized on behalf of the 'Freedom Budget for all Americans.' "

The architect of that 1963 march, Bayard Rustin, is also the principal coordinator of the Freedom Budget as director of the A. Philip Randolph institute.

Rustin announced that a massive education program had begun through cooperating groups to garner nationwide support for the plan. Hundreds of thousands of copies of the budget, published in an 84-page booklet, were being sent to the sponsoring organizations.

10-YEAR PLAN AIMS TO ERASE POVERTY

Rights, Religious and Labor Leaders Ask $185-Billion U.S. 'Freedom Budget'

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

A $185-billion "freedom budget for all Americans" designed to end poverty in the United States in the next 10 years was proposed yesterday by a coalition of civil rights, religious and labor leaders.

Conceived by A. Philip Randolph, Negro rights and labor official, the budget would be requested from the Federal Government to extend greatly the operations of social, educational and antipoverty programs.

Such a grant would require an act of congress.

The plan, as outlined at a two-hour conference at the Salem Methodist Church, Seventh Avenue and 129th Street, attacks the causes of poverty on several fronts. It seeks a guaranteed annual income, increased welfare and Social Security payments, full employment, a rise in farm income and health, housing and educational opportunities for all persons.

New Taxes Barred

The proposal's monetary concepts were worked out by a team of economists, headed by Dr. Leon Keyserling, who said the program would neither require new taxes nor cut into expenditures for the war in Vietnam.

Dr. Keyserling, chairman of former President Harry S. Truman's Council of Economic Advisers, maintained that the money could come from projected "economic growth dividends" of the nation's gross national product for the next 10 years.

The sponsors estimate that the "economic growth dividend from our gross national product [the sum of the nation's goods and services] would total $2,442-billion from 1966 through 1975 from which the needs of the freedom budget could be met.

This dividend was explained as the still uncommitted taxes the Federal Government would collect during this 10-year period, or Federal surplus income.

The conference, attended by close to 100 persons, stressed that the plan hoped to improve the lives of more than 34 million Americans, 75 per cent of whom were white.

"The tragedy is that the workings of our economy so often pit the white poor and the black poor against each other at the bottom of society," Mr. Randolph told the group.

In a clear, deep baritone, the 77-year-old head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, said:

"We cannot achieve these goals through haphazard, piecemeal efforts. For better or worse, we are one nation and one people. We shall solve our problems together or together we shall enter a new era of social disorder and disintegration."

Mr. Randolph said that "not since the march on Washington has there been such broad sponsorship and enthusiastic support as has been mobilized on behalf of the freedom budget for all Americans."

The architect of that 1963 march, Bayard Rustin, is the principal coordinator of the freedom budget as director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Mr. Rustin announced that a massive education program had begun to attract nationwide support for the plan. Hundreds of thousands of copies of the budget, published in an 8[illegible]-page booklet, were being sent to the sponsoring organizations.

He said he expected many student groups to welcome the opportunity to "reassert a student leadership in the civil rights movement that the freedom budget will make possible."

'Every Method Possible'

In addition, Mr. Rustin said, New York's Senators, Jacob K. Javits, Republican, and Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat, have promised to introduce Mr. Randolph to other Senators at a meeting in January to explain the proposal.

Extended lobbying for the plan will be the major responsibility of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an amalgamation of rights, labor and religious groups, that is headed by Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"We'll use every method possible to translate the proposal into reality," Mr. Wilkins told the meeting.

Theodore M. Kheel, the labor mediator, said the budget was good for business as well as for the poor.

"Today's outcast can be tomorrow's customer," he said, "The wage earners [auto workers] whose increases were attacked as inflationary are now the auto industry's best customers."

Donald Slaiman, director of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Relations Department of Civil Rights, told the group:

"We in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. reject the proposition that the social and economic progress must be suspended because of the costs of the war.

"Such a suspension could be the costliest penalty of all, for the strength of American society, on which is based the spirit of the American people, is the nation's most powerful weapon on every front."

Walter P. Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers, who did not attend the conference because of other commitments, sent a statement that said in part:

"We have not achieved our present stature in the world by patient acceptance of explanations, however plausible, of why something cannot be done.

Drafted New Deal Laws

"We have demanded, rather, that we find ways to achieve our goals and in the shortest possible time. There is no limit on American ingenuity and imagination. There is only a limit on our will to use them."

In addition to the social changes, the budget proposes that funds be allocated to "overcome other manifestations of neglect in the public sector, by purifying our airs and waters, and bringing our transportation systems and natural resource development into line with the needs of a growing population and an expanding economy."

Mr. Keyserling, who was a major drafter of New Deal legislation under President Franklin D. Roosevelt, said the program could be funded "without robbing anyone." While the economist would not at first give a hard figure that would be requested from the Government, he later agreed with an evaluation from another economist that $185-billion would be asked.

Mr. Keyserling was a principal speaker in New York earlier this year at a meeting that preceded the White House Conference on Civil Rights, where he maintained that the war in Vietnam had had no effect on poverty programs because the nation could afford both.

He maintained then, as he did yesterday, that what was necessary to win the campaign against poverty was a realization of the total cost and the will of Government to make the expenditure.

Maintaining that poverty could be defeated through the social and antipoverty agencies, Mr. Keyserling a stocky, peppery man, remarked:

"The envelopes are already addressed. All we have to do is put more money in them."

The economist was referring to Social Security envelopes and those of other agencies for social improvement that needed more money.

The announcement of the freedom budget marked the first time since the split over black power earlier this year that the five major civil rights groups had agreed to work together publicly on a major national program.

While their roles in the budget have not yet been detaile[illegible] spokesmen for the N.A.A.C.P., the Congress of Racial Equality, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Urban League have said their groups will cooperate fully.

After a recent discussion of the proposal with Mr. Rustin, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. indicated that his Southern Christian Leadership Conference might sponsor nationwide demonstrations to gain support for the plan

The freedom budget booklet lists 140 sponsors, including I. W. Abel, president of the United Steelworkers of America, Morri B. Abram, president of the American Jewish Committee; Kenneth B. Clark, psychology professor at the University of the City of New York, Msgr. George S. Higgins, director of the National Catholic Welfare Conference; Benjamin Spock, national chairman of the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy, and Mitchell Svirdoff, director of the New York City Department of Human Resources.

'Budget' to End Poverty Stirs Capital Skepticism and Sympathy

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27—Officials here reacted today with a mixture of skepticism and sympathy to a proposed $185-billion "freedom budget" to eliminate poverty in America over the next 10 years.

The proposal was disclosed at a meeting in New York City yesterday by a coalition of civil rights, religious and labor leaders.

Conceived by A. Philip Randolph, a Negro leader and labor official, it seeks to abolish poverty through massive government expenditures on job programs, higher welfare payments, a guaranteed annual income, increased farm income, and large-scale attacks on disease and urban decay.

The "freedom budget" was backed up by an 84-page statistical analysis prepared by Dr. Leon Keyserling, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in the Truman Administration. Dr. Keyserling led a team of economists who worked out the monetary proposals in the "budget."

Many officials acknowledged that they had not read the report but that newspaper accounts of it had caused some discussion.

Those who had seen the report, however, offered a variety of opinions. One White House source said that many of the broad goals of the "freedom budget" were "not at all inconsistent with the aims of the Great Society," although he did not specifically endorse the 10-year timetable.

An official of the Office of Economic Opportunity, Robert A. Levine, said that the $185-billion figure was "not unreasonable" when compared with some Government estimates of what it would take to eradicate poverty.

However, Mr. Levine was quick to add that poverty program officials felt generally that the additional cost of ending poverty, over and above existing programs, would be "substantially lower" than Dr. Keyserling's estimates.

He suggested that the difference might be because Dr. Keyserling had included in the "freedom budget" a number of items—farm income and anti-pollution efforts, for example—not normally counted as welfare or anti-poverty expenditures.

The chief criticism, however, was raised by a Government economist who disputed the economic assumptions that underlie the proposal.

Dr. Keyserling assumed an annual growth rate of 5 per cent in the Gross National Product—the dollar measure of the total goods and services produced by the nation's economy. The gross national product has been currently estimated to be at a rate of nearly $750-billion annually.

Dr. Keyserling estimated that the first-year addition to the gross national product would amount, therefore, to abount $35-billion, and that cumulative additions to a steadfastly expanding "base" figure would amount to $2,442-trillion over the next decade.

This figure, Dr. Keyserling contended, would produce additional tax revenues for the Federal Government of $400-million to $550-billion, even at present rates—sufficient, in his view to pay for $185-billion in new "priority programs" for the very poor and still allow for increases in other Federal programs.

The Government economist suggested that the 5 per cent average annual growth rate assumed by Dr. Keyserling was excessively optimistic, and that, accordingly, the growth in Government revenue might be somewhat less than forecast in the "budget."

Moreover, some officials appeared suspicious of any long-range program on the ground that it could not make allowances for unforeseen spending needs, such as wider wars, a huge jump in the space program and Congressional demands for veterans' benefits.

"The point of annual budgets," one economist said, "is that it gives us each year a chance to reassess priorities in the light of the economy's performance. A long-range plan tends to tie you down."

Dr. Keyseling, however, seemed undaunted. He said he did not expect immediate acceptance of the long-term commitments implicit in the proposal. He voiced hope that it would persuade people that such a program was "economically feasible" without "raising taxes," and that it would improve "public acceptability" to the notion of mobilizing the nation's resources against poverty over a long period of time.

The legislative prospects for some specific items in the "freedom budget" — particularly the notion of a guaranteed annual income — were seen here as dim.

Michigan Democrat Says U.S. Must Get Priorities Straight

By KAY KOCHTITZKY

The $1.7 billion allocated for the war on poverty in this country, compared with the billions spent on the war in Viet Nam, is a misplacement of America's immediate priorities.

This is the opinion expressed by Congressman John Conyers Jr. (Dem., Mich.) in an address Thursday night to the annual meeting of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations.

"As a member of the Great Society team, I have contended that the $1.7 billion spent on the war on poverty, when we spend billions on that horrible war in Viet Nam, is a misplacement of our immediate priorities," he told the group.

Conyers said America must get her priorities straightened out. "America's greatest priorities to be fulfilled are right here in our own slums and rural areas," he said.

Conyers, the first Negro appointed to the House Judiciary Committee, said the war on poverty "must not be a struggle to support people."

He said the poverty program should "give people the chance they deserve to develop their capabilities so they and others can share the promise of this nation."

The issue in the United States today, Conyers said, is equal rights for the American Negro.

The right to the ballot is the most important civil rights accomplishment, he said. "This is truly the key to all we are doing," he told the Council.

Conyers was introduced by Aaron Henry of Clarksdale, state NAACP president.

The Rev. Duncan Gray, Episcopal priest from Meridian, gave the welcome, and Dr. Perry Nussbaum, of Temple Beth Israel in Jackson, introduced the guests. The invocation was given by the Rev. Nathaniel Machesky, Roman Catholic priest from Greenwood.

CARMICHAEL ASKS DRAFT'S DEFIANCE

MOVEMENT

Scores Vietnam War at Rally for Black Power on Coast

10/30/66

By LAWRENCE E. DAVIES

Special to The New York Times

BERKELEY, Calif., Oct. 29 —Stokely Carmichael assailed the Johnson Administration today and called upon the nation's youth to say "Hell, no! to the draft."

A big segment of an audience of more than 10,000 on campus here gave the leader in the black power movement a standing avation when he shouted:

"We have to say there's a higher law than a racist named McNamara, a fool named Rusk and a buffoon named Johnson."

Mr. Carmichael, the national chairman of the Stu- Committee, also referred disparagingly to Gov. Edmund G. Brown, a two-term Democrat, and his Republican challenger, Ronald Reagan.

Without naming the two candidtes, whose increasingly bitter campaign furnished a backdrop for the all-day rally in the university's outdoor Greek Theater, Mr. Carmichael asked his audience:

"Can you disassociate yourself from two clowns that go up and down the state talking about each other? Can you disassociate yourself from two idiots like that?"

Scattered Heckling

Later in his speech, which drew frequent laughter and applause, and a few instances of heckling, which he disregarded, he told his hearers that "You can't move morally against a man like Brown or Reagan—you've got to move politically to put them out of business." He added:

"You can't move morally against Lyndon Baines Johnson. He's an amoral man."

Mr. Carmichael, in his wide-ranging talk of 55 minutes, covered the war in Vietnam, the draft, civil rights and a group of other subjects in what was billed as a "black power conference."

He had been detained in New York by his draft board for so to cancel an appearance at a long yesterday that he had had black power meeting on the Stanford University campus at Palo Alto.

At an early morning conference with leaders of Negro groups that had opposed the Berkeley rally in the wake of recent racial rioting in this area, he had agreed not to talk black power to a predominantly white audience. As a result the protesters publicly withdrew their objections to his appearance.

Despite his decision, announced at a San Francisco news conference this morning, not to speak to the rally's theme, the audience in the amphitheater faced a lectern draped with a red-lettered sign: "Black power and its challenges."

White and Negro organizers spoke during a period of more than six hours before Mr. Carmichael's arrival.

One unscheduled speaker, a leather-jacketed young Negro, Rodney Fletcher, grabbed a microphone and told the crowd: "If you're going to talk to black people you better get your guns. The revolution you are intellectualizing is in the streets. Go down to your jails and find out how many black people are rooming there.

Danny Grey of Watts, scene of the August, 1965, rioting, the next speaker, said on the same theme: "I am not saying we are advocating guns in the streets but if the white community doesn't take protective action we're going to have to do something to protect Negroes from white people."

The Berkeley rally had been opposed not only by some Negro leaders but by Mr. Reagan, the former television and movie actor, who had sent Mr. Carmichael a telegram asking him not to appear.

"I didn't dignify it by even answering him," the S.N.C.C. official told a questioner.

He also said at his news conference:

"I want to make it clear that we are not a tool of the radical left or right. We have not become a partisan political organization."

The rally, preceded by weeks of negotiation between university officials and the sponsoring organization, Students for a Democratic Society, a new left group, had prompted heated last hour exchanges between Governor Brown and Mr. Reagan.

Governor Brown had interrupted his campaign on Thursday to fly to Oakland to meet with law enforcement authorities of the Bay area. He expressed himself as satisfied that there would be no violations at the rally but that the police were ready to cope with any contingency.

Frank Woodward, the campus police chief, said there were "no incidents".

Mr. Reagan, at a Commonwealth Club luncheon in San Francisco yesterday, labeled the Governor's Oakland meeting "a grandstand stunt."

Mr. Brown called a news conference in Sacramento and warned "those who are attempting to turn race against race—black power wielders and white supremacist shouters" — that "they will be shown no quarter and given no amnesty in California."

Black Power Rally Set for Washington Canceled by Powell

MOVEMENT

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1 (UPI)—Representative Adam Clayton Powell has canceled a proposed black power national conference and withdrawn as its "sole convenor," his office disclosed today.

The Manhattan Democrat had scheduled the meeting for the Thanksgiving weekend, but called it off in a letter mailed Friday to about 500 potential delegates.

Mr. Powell said in the letter he did not believe one man should act as organizer of the movement. He suggested that a national committee be set up to convene a national conference some time next year. He said he would serve on such a panel.

"The growth and development of 'black power' will stagnate as long as only one man is responsible for the organizing thrust," Mr. Powell wrote. "Black people themselves must provide the mass basis necessary for success.

"I, therefore feel it is best to withdraw as the sole convener of the national conference on black power.

"I am unequivocally committed to the concept of 'black power' as a means to achieving immediately full political and economic power as well as educational excellence for the black masses."

Mr. Powell originally called the conference at the request of Stokely Carmichael, head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee but later disassociated himself from Mr. Carmichael's black power pronouncements.

Warmth of Whites in Mississippi Encourages N.A.A.C.P.'s Leader on Tour

Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., Nov. 16—Roy C. Wilkins, whose name used to be anathema here, today completed a five-day speaking tour of Mississippi that was marked by several surprising developments.

In Canton, the Mayor came out for a rally in honor of Mr. Wilkins, the executive director of the National Association of Colored People. The Mayor, who is white, stayed to the end and joined with 400 Negroes in singing "We Shall Overcome."

In Tchula, a little town in race-conscious Holmes County where Negroes once lived in dread of the White Citizens Council, the main street was thrown open for a Wilkins speech and Negro rally. Later the Mayor invited Mr. Wilkins to visit him.

White businessmen came out to meet Mr. Wilkins in Natchez and gave assurances that Negroes would be hired in growing numbers in downtown stores and businesses.

"This was a very satisfying experience," Mr. Wilkins said of his tour, during which he spoke in 15 towns, "and I had the opportunity to talk to several thousand people."

"Whites didn't come out in great numbers," Mr. Wilkins said, "but some did show up at the meetings and we talked with others."

"I get the impression," he said, "that Mississippi officials in many localities and the middle and upper echelon of business people who were not interested before are now deeply concerned about race relations."

Mr. Wilkins, who four years ago was arrested on Jackson's main street because he sought service at a "white" restaurant, found no obstacles to service or lodging on this visit and was warmly greeted in many places. His appearances, even in the racially tough town of Philadelphia, failed to stir any immediate white segregationist reaction.

At several places where he spoke, Mr. Wilkins lashed out at "black power" and defended his organization's position in the battle over the pre-school Head Start program in Mississippi between the Child Development Group of Mississippi and the newly funded Mississippi Action for Progress, Inc.

Several N.A.A.C.P. leaders in the state, among them Aaron Henry, state president of the organization, have taken positions on the board of the new Head Start group. This has evoked protests from the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party a predominanily Negro group, and from other civil rights militants.

During the tour Mr. Wilkins said he had recommended refunding of the Child Development Group and had given support to Mississippi Action for Progress only after it appeared that there would otherwise be no prospect for a statewide Hea Start program.

Mr. Wilkins said that N.A.A.C.P. membership in Mississippi has doubled since 1965. Sources in the organization's state headqquarters here said there were now 10,000 members in the state.

False Used Car Ads Called Blot on Whole Auto Industry

ATLANTIC CITY (AP) — E. S. Kossman, president of the Association, criticized car dealers who lured the public into showrooms with false advertising. He said the "razzle-dazzle price cutting advertising" put a blot on the whole auto industry.

He spole at the 48th annual convention of the New Jersey Automotive Trade Association.

Says at Hearing McKissick Hinders Negro Progress by Black Power Stand

NYT 12/9/66

By United Press International

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8—Senator Robert F. Kennedy, a frequent defender of civil rights causes, accused Floyd B. McKissick today of hindering rather than helping Negroes by his black power advocacy.

The New York Democrat, a member of a Senate subcommittee studying urban decay, engaged in an exchange with Mr. McKissick after the head of the Congress of Racial Equality had defended black power and said one of its aims was to make ghettos livable.

"You make our job very hard when you put us up against such a slogan," said Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff, Democrat of Connecticut who is the subcommittee's chairman.

Mr. McKissick replied that he saw nothing wrong with it and doubted it would be changed.

"It is the slogan and what is associated with it that has set back the civil rights movement," Mr. Kennedy said.

Change Stressed

There has always been a drive to achieve black power, Mr. McKissick said, but it was not voiced previously because "we didn't want to offend the white man." He said this had changed.

"It would appear you are turning your back on Negroes and whites working together and if people can't meet your definition, you read them out," Mr. Kennedy responded.

"I believe black power will be accepted just like Irish power has been accepted," Mr. McKissick said.

He said he was not throwing anyone out of the movement.

Mr. McKissick said several times during his testimony that the civil rights movement, as originally conceived, was dead. It died with the March on Washington in 1963, he said, because it dealt strictly with integration. A vacuum now has been filled with black power, he said.

In explaining black power, Mr. McKissick said CORE sought Negro political and economic power, creation of a black consumer bloc, enforcement of Federal laws and an end to police brutality.

Floyd B. McKissick, head of the Congress of Racial Equality, addressing Senate subcommittee yesterday.

The Negro, he said, "is no longer ashamed of his color, that his roots are in Africa. He doesn't cut off all his hair because it is kinky."

Logical Successor

Mr. McKissick said black power was the logical successor to the civil rights movement, which he contended dealt primarily with integration of the 10 per cent of the Negroes who belonged to the middle class and not with the 90 per cent who lived in poverty.

He said CORE sought to provide Negroes with militant leadership but that it disapproved of violence. He said CORE had prevented racial violence in Baltimore last summer.

Racism, Mr. McKissick said, is the cause of racial violence. "Until we can solve the problem of racism, we cannot solve the problem of the ghettos," he said.

Previous witnesses have expressed concern at the lack of Federal and local action over the growing plight of cities.

"There is no better argument for black power, for the mobilization of the black community as a political, social and economic bloc, than the words you have heard in this room," Mr. McKissick said.

"This is what we have always meant by black power. It is a rational militant call from a whole segment of this nation's population to do what you have not been able to do — destroy racism in this country, create full employment in the American ghetto, revise the educational system to cope with the 20th century and make the American ghetto a place in which it is possible to live with hope."

He also said:

"For God's sake, end this terrible war in Vietnam, bring black men home to rebuild their own lives, their own communities, and take the incredible costs of killing and use them to save the lives of the poor."

The Changing Civil Rights Movement

AC 12/12/66

WASHINGTON—Anyone curious about the change that has come over the civil rights movement in America had only to watch Floyd McKissick and A. Philip Randolph in their separate appearances before the Senate Cities Committee last week.

Randolph, the president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, is 78. McKissick, the chairman of the Council of Racial Equality, is 44, and has spent the best years of his life in litigation to get himself and his children into the schools they wished to attend.

For Randolph, the 1963 March on Washington represented the culmination of a lifetime of patience, persuasion and hope. For McKissick, that romantic and moving episode was "a glorious picnic," which signalled "the death of the civil rights movement," and led to the creation of "black power."

Randolph was brought up in the tradition of "black and white together." But broken promises, he told the committee in his sad, deep tones, have split the Negro youth from its old leadership, and the grand old man of the struggle is shunned by his own in the ghettoes.

McKissick obviously does not have this problem of alienation. A band of youths followed him into the caucus room and applauded when he said the first step towards racial peace is to end the war in Viet Nam.

Randolph fears the future, the explosion of the sullen young rebels in the ghetto. McKissick seems almost jaunty. He has a slogan which he has no intention of abandoning, although Sens. Abraham Ribicoff and Robert Kennedy warned him it was dangerous and divisive. He has a program and, obviously, he thinks the times are with him.

The senators deplored the "black power" concept, they ignored his program, but they were obviously impressed by McKissick's recollection of things past.

What made him an agitator was an incident of his childhood. As a 13-year-old Boy Scout, he was assigned to patrol a street blocked off for skating. Challenged by a policeman, he resisted—"you know," he said, "a Boy Scout is supposed to be trustworthy, obedient, loyal"—and was struck and carried off to the police station.

Up until then, he did not know whether to be a lawyer or a preacher. That taste of "blood and asphalt" decided him. He went on to college, to law school, the Army, all the while bringing suits on various schools that closed their doors on him and his children.

"That is the difference between black and white," he said. "You have to spend the productive years fighting for what—you don't know—for no reason other than that you woke up one morning and found out you were black."

12/14/66

MOVEMENT NYT

Atlanta, Dec. 13 — The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. has begun a two-month leave, during which he will write a book analyzing the civil rights movement and where it is headed, his aides said today.

Dr. King will confer with Harper & Row Publishers, Inc., in New York tommorrow. It was understood that he would then go to the Bahamas. The need for a rest is believed to be another reason for the leave.

Dr. King, leader of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said in a news release that he had decided to write the book becauseof recent events in the rights field.

"There is an uneasy feeling in the rights movement that we may have lost our sense of direction, and tha the forces of goodwill are in disarray," he said. "I feel a need to reexamine the course of our movement and to suggest new ideas and programs."

The book is tentatively entitled "Where Do We Go From Here?". Dr. King's office said he planned to evaluate progress in the rights drive, the white backlash, implications of the black power slogan and Federal priorities.

"Our traditional allies are now in search of new purpose and meaning, and I hope the book help in this quest," the statement said.

During Dr. King's absence the Leadership Conference will be directed by the Rev. Ralph Abernathy, vice president-at-large and secretary-treasurer, and Rev. Andrew Young, exeecutive director.

5 OF 6 INSURGENTS LOSE IN N.A.A.C.P.

NYT 1/4/67

Traditionalists Are Returned in Board Election

By DAVID HALBERSTAM

All but one of the insurgents seeking election to the board of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were defeated yesterday.

The association's national membership returned five of the traditionalists to office, including Walter P. Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers.

Of the so-called young Turks, only Mrs. Daisy Bates, famed for her leadership during the Little Rock school crisis and thus the best known of the insurgents, was elected.

The board election had attracted considerable attention. In a direct challenge to the organization's leadership, the insurgents had charged that the N.A.A.C.P. was not keeping up with the times, that it had failed to adapt to new methods in the civil rights fight.

Controlled Nomination

The young Turks, who controlled the nominating committee of the national board, put up their own six candidates for the at-large seats, thereby dumping six traditional members. The incumbents decided to contest the election, however, and yesterday the results were announced at the association's annual meeting.

One N.A.A.C.P. official, who correctly predicted the results earlier in the day, said that the insurgents had hurt themselves by appearing to some of the membership to be too critical of Roy Wilkins, the organization's executive director.

This official said that although an insurgent victory would not necessarily have reflected anti-Wilkins feeling, yesterday's vote did strengthen Mr. Wilkins's position.

The N.A.A.C.P.'s voting procedure is complicated. Each local chapter voted for the twelve candidates and the six top names were sent in, each with a numerical score that reflects the size of the chapter.

Mr. Reuther received 1,182 votes for the highest total.

Others elected were:

Bishop Stephen G. Spottswood, chairman of the board since 1961, with 1,061 votes; Arthur B. Spingarn, a former president of the organization and now honorary president, who like Mr. Reuther is white, with 1,045 votes; former Judge Hubert T. Delaney of New York City, with 958 votes; Mrs. Bates, with 901 votes; and Dr. H. Claude Hudson, a Los Angeles banker, with 799 votes.

Mathew Perry, a South Carolina lawyer, was the one traditionalist defeated in the election.

Two of the leaders of the young Turk movement tallied particularly low totals. Chester Lewis, a Wichita, Kan., lawyer who has been critical of the regular leadership, received 542 votes, and L. Joseph Overton, a New York labor leader, received 465.

Mr. Lewis, in a keynote speech to the New York state chapter last October, called for the inclusion "of younger grassroots individuals and groups on the board."

Mr. Wilkins, who reviewed the last year in civil rights for both the association and newsmen at a press conference yesterday, appeared particularly confident. He called 1966 a "fair" year for civil rights, although a good year for the N.A.A.C.P.

Mr. Wilkins defended Adam Clayton Powell, needled other civil rights organizations, decried the failure of Congress to pass a civil rights bill in 1966, and gave a serious warning to Northern and Western urban officials and educators.

This last was his most somber note of the day.

"It is my considered opinion," he said, "that until we launch a crash program that seriously addresses itself to the gross and disgraceful racial discriminations and inequities in our public school systems in Northern and Western urban centers, we will have riotous outbreaks plaguing us with disturbing frequency."

Young Negroes will riot, he said, "because the world of education has failed to reach and teach the language of democracy, opportunity and dignity. We cannot talk to these people. The language of the white community and of white municipal officials is not their language."

"Bluntly stated," Mr. Wilkins concluded, "the alternative to the dilly-dallying of the day is riots."

Earlier, he reported that the N.A.A.C.P. had a gross income from all sources of $1,408,385, an increase over 1965 of $28,072.

Of the total figure, he said, 82 per sent came from the membership. Thus, he said, only "those organizations which depend on white people suffered" financially because of the changes in the civil rights fight in 1966.

Carmichael Blasts Demos For Treatment of Powell

MOVEMENT

AJ 1/9/67

By BILL WINN

Stokely Carmichael, head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, issued a broad condemnation of the national Democratic party Monday with Atlanta Rep. Julian Bond standing at his side.

Speaking to a crowd of about 50 reporters and onlookers at a service station, Mr. Carmichael charged that the Democratic party has been "feeding on the needs of Afro-Americans. We, the nourishment of the Democratic party, are given in return racists' vomit and are expected to swallow it, grin, and shuffle away saying, 'Thank you, boss man.'"

Mr. Carmichael accused the Democratic party of attacking New York Rep. Adam Clayton Powell in the "high-handed manner that the . . . party has always used toward Afro-Americans in this country.

"THEIR CIVIL rights bills were not worth the time and energy some secretaries spent in typing them," the civil rights leader said.

"They (the bills) were obviously designed to pacify Afro-Americans, shut them up, keep them off the streets, but we will not be pacified. We will not shut up. We will not stay off the streets."

Mr. Carmichael, who read from a prepared statement, said that Rep. Powell was being punished for doing "what every other congressman does and for doing it with more style."

He addressed part of his remark directly to President Johnson:

"Lyndon Johnson, we remember the challenge of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party. Afro-Americans from Mississippi were not represented in the Congress. . . . The Democratic party told them to go back to Mississippi.

"Now we see once again your Democratic party operating as it has always operated. . . . We remember that our votes, the votes of black men and women across this nation, are responsible for Democrats sitting in Congress and in the White House.

"We remember, Lyndon Johnson, and we will remember when the Democratic party comes into the black community in 1968, with its platitudes and promises, its words of sympathy and its posture of being the Afro-American's friend."

Mr. Carmichael closed his remarks by saying, "Take away Powell and we will take away Johnson. And if you don't believe it, baby, just try us."

Harlem Still Hot on Powell Issue, Taking It as a Personal Affront

NYT 1/12/67 MOVEMENT

By DAVID HALBERSTAM

The discussions yesterday in Harlem's restaurants and bars, beauty parlors and homes and on the streets were chiefly on one subject—Adam Clayton Powell.

There was anger there, but it was controlled rather than open, and personal rather than public.

"It's like a death in the family," said Floyd McKissick, the national director of the Congress of Racial Equality. "It's like there's mourning in every family here."

"I've never seen it so personnal," said Bayard Rustin, influential Negro intellectual. "It's as if the action was not taken against Adam Powell but against Harlem. Everyone here lived a little with Adam, and went down a little with him."

Harlem had suspected the worst, and when Mr. Powell lost his committee chairmanship on Monday the anger began. It set in even more on Tuesday when he temporarily lost his seat; their seat, they believe.

"I've lived in Harlem for 25 years," said Mrs. Etta Burten, a housewife, 1305 Amsterdam Avenue, "and the people don't know him, don't know what he's done for Harlem. How can I talk—it would take me years."

"Powell was the only man who carried out his promises to Negroes," said William Johnson, an unemployed longshoreman, "and so because he did this, they got rid of him. I would back Powell one million per cent. Even the Uncle Toms will back Powell. He's a black man, thinks black, talks black. A soul brother because he feels what black people feel."

Loved His Arrogance

"They loved him," Mr. McKissick said, "because he was arrogant, so arrogant that he couldn't be controlled by anybody black or white. He was always saying what they wanted to say, doing what they wanted to do, doing in the open what the white man did in private."

That was just the trouble, said Miss Luise Gilens 27 years old, who was interviewed at the corner of Seventh Avenue and 119th Street. "He should have tried to hide what he did just like the rest of them. He was too bold. He put his business out on the streets."

One 70-year-old woman who disagreed with the others and refused to give her name said:

"I knew him and his family. He was a nice boy. But I was ashamed of his statement after he heard the Congress' decision. He sounded like a black nationalist." She referred to Mr. Powell's contention that his exclusion was a "lynching — Northernstyle."

David Henderson, 18, a bank teller said it was "black supremacy all over again."

"When you're black you stand out. They unseated Adam to show black people that they're not as big as they think they are. I hope we put him back where he belongs—be rebellion, strength, I'm all for violence, any shape any form if this is what it takes to get him back."

"I cried when I eard it," said Mrs. Lucille Lanclos, who is in her 70's. "You got to stick with him through the thick and thin. All they want us to be is porters and scrubwomen. He's a black man so they don't want him to have power.

"Why do they hate the black man so? We put him there—why do they have to take him away? I don't believe in violence but I believe you reap what you sow—that's what the Bible says, so I'm praying."

Special Relationship

Part of the explanation for the intensity of the feeling is the special relationship between Mr. Powell and his district. There was, said Mr. Rustin, a relationship between Harlem's suffering and misery and Mr. Powell's jauntiness and stylish life. "They enjoyed him mocking the white hypocrisy and the white politician," he said.

A beauty shop owner on Seventh avenue who asked that her name not be used said: "He was our leader and he was our friend. He helped us years ago and you got to remember it. Why I remember a store here and it didn't hire colored people and so Adam said in 1939 'come on children, let's walk' and so we picketed and now there's as many colored working there as white." Commenting on Mr. Powell's actions in Congress, she added:

"I don't say he did right, but if he was a white man he'd of gotten away with it."

Another woman, shopping on 125th street said:

"He had too much power and seniority to be a Negro. We have to unite or they'll keep cutting us down. I don't want to give you my name because when your name's on paper, Mr. Charley's got you on his list."

Mr. Charley is Negro slang for the white man.

'Has to Be a Revolution'

In a drugstore at 125th Street and Lenox Avenue, Everald J. Walsh, a young man in his twenties who described himself as a social researcher, said:

"Everybody should be prepared to go to war. If we can die in Vietnam we should be willing to die right here. There has to be a revolution. Lyndon Johnson sold out under pressure from politicians who have to help him justify his policies in Vietnam. So Powell was the scapegoat. Whitey plays a fine hand of poker."

John Mathews, a record store clerk who was interviewed on 119th Street, said:

"He gave them too much rope and they hung him with it. He should be a symbol for the black people. Somebody has to stand tall and set an example. But his personal image is not the true image of the black people. I don't go for that playboy stuff."

Charles Morgan, 34, a salesman said: "Powell is a powerful Negro, lots of support and backing. So they had to find some reason to oust him. When you're too powerful and black they want you out."

CARMICHAEL ASSERTS HE WON'T RUN AGAIN

MOVEMENT

CHICAGO, Jan. 15 (UPI)—Stokely Carmichael the Negro leader, said today that he was not going to seek re-election as head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

In a brief interview on a television program, Irv Kupcinet's Morning Show, Mr. Carmichael said, however, he was "not going to retire."

The committee, which shrank under Mr. Carmichael from a biracial civil rights group to a hard-core, Negro protest organization, will hold elections in May.

Mr. Carmichael assumed command of the committee, amid rumors of a financial crisis, last May in a shakeup that saw John Lewis deposed as chairman and James Foreman as executive secretary.

Formed in 1960 during the sit-in movement, the committee became a leading civil rights group. After passage of the Civil Rights and Voting Rights Acts, however, it turned much of its attention toward protests against United States involvement in Vietnam.

One of Mr. Carmichael first acts as chairman was to begin a purge of white members of the group. Lated it grew more militant with shsouts of "black power."

Dr. King Plagued by Resistance And Apathy in Chicago Slums

MOVEMENT

Rights Leader's Aides Cite Some Gains, but Find Problems of Northern Ghetto Tougher Than Those in the South

1/16/67

By DONALD JANSON

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, Jan. 15—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr's latest venture in his year-long drive to eradicate Chicago slums is encountering resistance at City Hall and apathy in the Negro ghettos.

The civil rights leader announced last month that the Chicago Freedom Movement would seek political leverage with an "intensive" and "massive" campaign to register Negroes to vote before the February and April elections for aldermen and Mayor.

Dr. King, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, summoned Hosea L. Williams from the organization's Atlanta headquarters to mobilize "political power in the Negro community." He arrived promptly with a dozen staff aides who had worked with him in voter registration campaigns throughout the South.

In their first month here, none of the new arrivals has taken a fancy to Chicago.

"I don't like Chicago," Mr. Williams asserted the other day. "We're used to working with people who want to be freed. The Chicago Negro isn't concerned about what the power structure is doing to him. It's cold here, and I'm having a lot of problems."

A Cold Reception

The reception from potential registrants has often been as chilly as the Chicago winter.

"One lady came at me with an icepick," Leon Hall of Montgomery reported after canvassing a typical South Side block of rundown tenements.

"A lot of people won't even talk to us," said Lester Hankerson of Savannah, who says he was beaten up by the state and local police in Grenada, Miss., two months ago. "I would rather be working there. People here are not interested in first-class citizenship."

"This is worse than Alabama," Mr. Hall asserted. "At least you have some fresh air there."

He pointed beyond the black snow and broken glass on a ghetto street to a long red-brick apartment building, formerly a warehouse, he had just canvassed. "Those people are so cramped up," he observed, it's like being in jail."

For years the entrenched Democratic organization of Mayor Richard J. Daley, nurtured by a pervasive patronage system, has been able to count on ghetto precinct captains for overwhelming election majorities.

[illegible] fourth view, the slow pace of progress in the civil rights movement here must be attributed in large part to dissention among the leaders of the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations, an umbrella organization of the affiliated civil rights groups.

"Dr. King's efforts have not been fruitless," he said, "but Chicago has been a nightmare. Our time schedule is way off base, largely because of division in the Negro leadership."

Albert A. Raby, convenor of the coordinating council, acknowledges that there is a sharp split in the civil rights leadership on how to gain political strength in Chicago.

Most of the younger, more militant Negroes, he said, want to mount an all-out attack to defeat the Daley organization as the only way to accomplish lasting social change.

The more conservative element, not as numerous but with better organized backing, prefers to restrict the campaign to the aldermanic level now for control of some 15 wards with large Negro populations.

Stronghold Is Sought

This element feels such an achievement would establish a stronghold the "machine" would have to respect and respond to in meeting the freedom movement's goals of equal opportunity in employment, education and housing.

These leaders say that Mayor Daley has made civil rights concessions when sufficient pressure was exerted, while the prospect for gains under a new power structure would be uncertain.

The pace of movement was stepped up when Dr. King's organizers, led by the Rev. James Bevel and the Rev. Jesse Jackson, arrived late in 1965. It spurted after Dr. King led open occupancy marches into bitterly resisting, all-white neighborhoods last summer.

Without political power the demonstrations have been essential to sustain momentum, even the most conservative voices agree. All elements of the movement expect the mass protests to be resumed next summer.

Dents have been made in the resistance to change. In nine months Mr. Jackson's Operation Bread Basket, employing economic boycotts, has produced 900 jobs for Negroes at five dairies, three soft drink companies and three retail grocery chains in the ghetto. It has

For years the entrenched Democratic organization of Mayor Richard J. Daley, nurtured by a pervasive patronage system, has been able to count on ghetto precinct captains for overwhelming election majorities.

The Mayor is seeking a fourth four-year term on April 4. Aldermen will be elected Feb. 28, with a runoff April 4 in any ward where no candidate receives a majority. Subservient organization candidates will have more opposition than usual from independent Negro candidates this time.

The registration drive is stressing problems and issues close to home for ghetto Negroes, but it is endorsing no candidates.

"We feel the people will be intelligent enough to vote for the right candidate when they know the issues," Dr. King said in announcing the drive. "If the Democratic machine is at fault, we hope the people will be intelligent enough to correct it. We want them to know it is necessary to participate in the political process."

Mr. Williams has been rushing from one neighborhood organization to another to brief Chicago Negroes helping with the campaign.

"There is no difference between the Daley machine in Chicago and the Wallace machine in Alabama, sugar," he told a questioner. "Both are out to keep you in slavery."

'They're Beaten Down'

"I have never seen such hopelessness," Mr. Williams said. "The Negroes of Chicago have a greater feeling of powerlessness than any I ever saw. They don't participate in the governmental process because they're beaten down psychologically."

Nearly a million of Chicago's 3.5 million residents are Negro. But an Urban League study shows that in 1962 only 63 per cent had registered to vote, compared with 78 per cent of the whites, and only 47 per cent had voted.

The Negro population has grown steadily since 1962, while that of whites in Chicago continues to decline, but figures of the Board of Election Commissioners show that in heavily Negro wards the voter turnout dropped in 1964 and again last November. Registration in some wards, Mr. Williams said, is now less than 50 per cent.

"The city discourages Negro registration," he asserted. "The lighter the registration, the easier it is for the machine to control the vote."

City officials took much of the steam out of the freedom movement's drive the week before last by refusing to open neighborhood centers where Negroes could qualify without making a trip downtown to City Hall.

"They said it would be too expensive," Mr. Williams exploded in his tiny, borrowed office in the heart of the Southside ghetto. "They wouldn't even give us what we got in Birmingham!"

There and elsewhere in the South civil rights workers led demonstrations until they got special registrars. Here neighborhood registration will be held, as usual before elections, on a single day, the last one for voters to register, a month before the aldermanic election Feb. 28.

In Mr. Williams's candid ment's goals of equal opportunity in employment, education and housing.

These leaders say that Mayor Daley has made civil rights concessions when sufficient pressure was exerted, while the prospect for gains under a new power structure would be uncertain.

Dents have been made in the resistance to change. In nine months Mr. Jackson's Operation Bread Basket, employing economic boycotts, has produced 900 jobs for Negroes at five dairies, three soft drink companies and three retail grocery chains in the ghetto. It has also forced the owners of these concerns to carry and display the products of Negro-owned businesses and to use Negro banks in the area.

Formation of a dozen tenant unions since last spring, a project in which Mr. Bevel has been engaged, has forced a few slum landlords to meet building code standards.

The fair housing demonstrations led by Dr. King last August brought wide-ranging commitments on open housing from Mayor Daley, the Chicago Real Estate Board, the Chicago Housing Authority, the Chicago Mortgage Bankers Association and other key groups.

But the accord has yet to be implemented, and skeptics charge that the Mayor, faced with potential backlash from white ethnic groups he must also court, will continue to go no further than politically necessary toward achievement of civil rights goals.

Mr. Raby said the freedom movement's long campaign to desegregate Chicago's schools and upgrade ghetto education had been a "total failure" so far.

Last week the United States Office of Education, after a year-long study to determine whether to cut off Federal aid because of violations of civil rights laws, reported that 90 per cent of Chicago's Negro teachers were still assigned to Negro schools and that 85 per cent of white elementary pupils and 8 per cent of Negro elementary students still attended schools segregated by residential patterns. The report warned that changes must be made if aid is to continue.

Mayor Daley is a strong favorite for re-election over his Republican opponent, John L. Waner. This would leave civil rights advocates to contend with the classic system of ghetto political exploitation that has thrived here for years.

Welfare Recipients 'Afraid'

"Every welfare recipient is afraid to oppose the wishes of the precinct captain," said the Rev. Delton Franz, pastor of the Woodlawn Mennonite Church in the southside ghetto and host to a meeting to enlist registration workers the other day.

"This explains the reluctance to register and vote for a reform candidate for alderman," he went on. "Everyone living in public housing is afraid. They have been told that the machine alderman is the one who insures them living quarters, who keeps them on the welfare rolls. It is a false but very effective threat. When you've got so little you just aren't going to gamble."

Civil rights leaders hope for a minor breakthrough next month. Many of them are backing aldermanic candidates whose records indicate they would fight for civil rights goals regardless of Mayor Daley's position.

Yet they are haunted by years of experience that has left ghetto Negroes, as one leader put it, "unconvinced that the democratic process can really change their lives."

Randolph Calls Negro Conference in Washington

By M. S. HANDLER

A conference of Negro leaders in all fields will be held in Washington next Wednesday to discuss ways to restore Representative Adam Clayton Powell to his seat to his chairmanship of the powerful House Labor and Education Committee. The leaders will also re-examine Negro-white relations.

A. Philip Randolph, a key civil rights leader who has initiated the meeting, has described it as a "summit conference" to take up what he calls a "crisis" in Negro-white relations.

A proposal that the conference blacklist Representative Emanuel Celler of the 10th District, among other Congressmen who opposed or failed to help Mr. Powell, was abandoned because most of the civil rights leaders felt that Mr. Celler was one of thhe foremost advocates of civil rights in Congress.

Last night, Mr. Randolph sent telegrams to about 100 Negro leaders of civil rights organizations, church denominations and labor unions, and also to Negro educators, professional men and women, prominent artists and entertainers.

The conference is to be held in the Church of the Redeemer, Presbyterian, at 15th and Girard Streets. The sessions will be all-Negro and closed to the public and observers.

In his telegram, Mr. Randolph, who is president of the Bortherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, said that the first purpose of the conference was to evaluate the developments of Mr. Powell's Congressional chairmanship and seat loss and that the second purpose was to evaluate the situation and the meaning of the action against Mr. Powell to 22 million Negroes.

Mr. Randolph sent the telegrams after consulting with Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Whitney M. Young Jr. of the National Urban League, Floyd McKissick of the Congress of Racial Equality, and Dorothy I. Height of the National Council of Negro Women.

Attendance to Be Limited

Mr. Randolph wants to limit the attendance to organizational heads and ntionally known persons.

According to an informed source, he has found that Mr. Powell's loss of his committee chairmanship and temporary loss of his seat has resulted in a deepening crisis in Negro-white relations. This, according to the consensus, requires a serious examination of the future status of Negroes in the United States.

According to this source Mr. Randolph felt that "we can learn one thing from the Powell affair—we must become politically more active in both parties and in the decision-making process."

Mr. Randolph, it is understood, will urge that the Washington conference examine and study the records of all Congressmen in the field of civil rights and specifically in relation to bills submitted to Congress to improve the condition of the Negroes.

It was learned, however, that all thought of including Representative Emanuel Celler of New York, who was named yesterday as head of the House Committee that will investigate Mr. Powell, among the Congressmen Negro voters will be asked to defeat because of their "hostile" or "ambivalent" attitude toward Mr. Powell, has now been abandoned by the organizers of the meeting. In a statement to The New York Times, Mr. Randolph said:

"There are no plans and I know of no plans to wage warfare against Congressman Celler. I regard Mr. Celler as a consistent and devoted advocate of civil rights in Congress for years. I consider him one of stanchest champions of civil rights in Congress."

Last week, when he announced the projected conference, Mr. Randolph let it be known that Representative Celler would be among a list of congressmen designated for defeat by the Negro voters in the northern urban industrial centers where there are substantial Negro populations. It was felt that Mr. Celler had not done enough to prevent Mr. Powell's defeat.

The decision to exclude Mr. Celler from the target list came during Mr. Randolph's consultations, which disclosed that most civil rights leaders and organizations hold Mr. Celler in high esteem.

Mr. Randolph announced that he has appointed Theodore E. Brown, a close associate, to coordinate the Washington conference. Mr. Brown is director of the American Negro Leadership Conference On Africa.

RIGHTS DRIVE LAGS IN MUCH OF SOUTH

MOVEMENT

Many Groups Are Cut Back and Battle for Survival as Contributions Decline

2/7/67

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

JACKSON, Miss., Feb. 6 — The civil rights movement has collapsed in broad areas of the South, and is fighting what seems to be a last-ditch battle for survival in its few remaining spheres of influence.

This is the unmistakeable picture in the region now as one tours such Southern states as Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia — states that as recently as six months ago were focal points of civil rights activity.

It results mainly from a sharp decline in contributions to civil rights groups, a shift of volunteers in the movement to the antipoverty campaign and protests against the war in Vietnam, and from a decision of the organizations to use some of their limited resources in the North.

Civil rights headquarters have been abandoned in many communities, and street demonstrations are now only a memory in all except a handful of Southern counties.

It is difficult now in most parts of the South to find a civil rights worker.

The civil rights organizations themselves report a total of only about 65 organizers actively working in the region (compared to about 300 a year ago), and most of these cannot afford a permanent office or telephone.

Rights Drive Lagging in South As Most Groups' Funds Decline

However, in the South's larger cities and in some of the rural counties, Negroes are carrying on for themselves — carrying out their own voter registration drives, appearing before local governing boards to ask for street and school improvements, and occasionally organizing cooperatives to improve their economic condition.

In Mississippi, Miss Marian Wright, chief counsel for the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., said that the civil rights movement might have left 6 to 12 of Mississippi's 82 counties with local organizations strong enough to carry out "meaningful" political and economic programs for Negroes.

"But I'm not sure," Miss Wright went on. "You'll have to give them six months or so before you know."

Miss Wright and several other Mississippi Negro leaders are trying to encourage action by local Negroes through a new organization called Mississippi Action for Community Education. This is an organization that hopes to get foundation grants to instruct Negroes in carrying out voter registration drives and other forms of political activity.

Cutback Called Sharp

"If you are talking about organizations, the movement has sharply diminished," said Pat Watters, who is completing a study of the civil rights movement for the Southern Regional Council, a human relations organization based in Atlanta. "But there are a number of independent activities being generated by local Negroes—voter registration drives and economic programs.

"One result of the civil rights movement has been to generate an ability among Negroes to fight their own battles," he went on. "Obviously this is not true among all Negroes and the danger is that civil rights organizations have cut back too soon."

The cutback, for the most part, has been among the "direct action" organizations that make up the bulk of the civil rights movement:

¶ Isaac Reynolds, Southern regional director of the Congress of Racial Equality, said today that his organization now had "12 or 13" workers in Mississippi and Louisiana, fewer than it had in one town — Bogalusa, La.—alone late in 1965.

¶In Atlanta, Charles Cobb, a communications officer for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, said his organization had five organizers active in Alabama, two in Arkansas, three or four in Mississippi, and one in Georgia. Last year, before it began dispersing its organizing force into New York, Philadelphia and Boston, the student committee had about 100 organizers in the South.

¶A staff member of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which is headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., said that "about a dozen" of the conference's organizers remained in the South last month, after the organization expanded its organizing force in Chicago for a voter registration drive there. In January of last year, the conference had 25 to 30 workers in Birmingham, Ala., and more scattered throughout the state.

¶The Delta ministry, the direct action arm of the National Council of Churches, says it now has 28 workers in Mississippi, compared with about 45 a year ago.

¶Another civil rights organization, the Medical Committee for Human Rights, which as recently as last summer provided doctors and nurses for the civil rights movement, has closed its office in Jackson.

Today, the officers of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party dramatized the current state of the movement in much of the South. The office doors were locked. The last of two telephones was removed several weeks ago. And across the hall, a man in a neighboring office said, "about once or twice a week someone will go in there for an hour or two and then they'll be gone."

Little more than a year ago, the party headquarters was one of the busiest civil rights outposts in the South. More than a dozen workers moved about the office on a typical day, answering telephones, operating a radio communications system that linked the office to staff workers in the "field," and feeding stacks of paper into mimeograph machines.

The decline, however, has not extended to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Urban League, which were established in the South before the 1960 sit-in demonstrations ushered in the "Negro Revolution."

The N.A.A.C.P. has 11 field directors and staff organizers in the South now, about the same number as it had in 1959, and plans to increase its staff later this year. The Urban League has an expansion program under way that it says, will give it about 17 affiliates in the South, about twice as many as it had in 1960.

Successful at Polls

For the most part, neither the N.A.A.C.P. or the Urban League has participated in direct action in the South. However, in Mississippi last year, the N.A.A.C.P. experimented with boycotts and street demonstrations and rallied Negroes into a political organization that was able to carry two counties last year for a Republican senatorial candidate, Prentice Walker.

Many of those still in the direct action wing of the movement seem uncertain as to what caused their organizations to decline in the South. Contributors, they say, simply stopped contributing and volunteers—who rushed into the South by the hundreds in the summer of 1964 and 1965 — stopped volunteering.

The decline began setting in after the march from Selma, Ala., to Montgomery, Ala., against voter discrimination in the spring of 1965, when the movement reached its peak in the South. And it accelerated after the student committee and CORE started their "black power" movement in the summer of 1966.

Internal conflict in the student committee and CORE, which have been torn over the question of whether whites should have a role in the civil rights movement, seem to have contributed to the decline.

Dr. King's Group Hurt

Although Dr. King's leadership conference stayed aloof from the black power movement, it also complains of sharp cutbacks in contributions.

The Rev. Andrew Young, Dr. King's chief aide, estimates that contributions are down 40 per cent over a year ago. The drop occurred in part, he says, because Northern whites lost interest in the movement after Negroes intensified their pressure for housing desegregation in Northern cities and suburbs.

Many Southern Negroes, meanwhile, are baffled by the rapid decline of the civil rights movement in their communities.

"All I know is there is not a bit of civil rights movement in LeFlore County now," said Robert Earl Thomas of Greenwood, Miss.

It was in that county that the student committee started voter registration activity in 1962, to be succeeded in 1964 by the Council of Federated Organizations, and in 1965 by the Mississippi Freedom Democratic party.

"First, S.N.C.C. went out," Mr. Thomas said, "then C.O.F.O. went out, and then M.F.D.P. went out—they all just went out."

LOST OPPORTUNITY FOR RIGHTS CITED

MOVEMENT

Moynihan Sees Failure to Follow Johnson's Lead

2/9/67

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

Daniel P. Moynihan, author of a controversial report on the Negro family, said in an article published yesterday that an opportunity to make a "total commitment to the cause of Negro equality" was lost 20 months ago because of the short-sightedness of civil rights leaders, Negro and white.

The article in the February issue of Commentary magazine says the nation was ready in June, 1965, to make this commitment after President Johnson, in a speech to the graduating class of Howard University in Washington, made a strong appeal for genuine equality for the Negro.

Mr. Moynihan called the speech "a bold beginning." But he said that before "half a year had passed the initiative was in ruins, and after a year and a half it is settled that nothing whatever came of it."

In the speech, Mr. Johnson called a White House conference, "To Fulfill These Rights." Mr. Moynihan, a former Assistant Secretary of Labor, was invited to participate.

Widespread Objections

At about the time of the President's speech, Mr. Moynihan wrote in Commentary, his report was published although it was intended to be an internal Labor Department document. It elicited widespread Negro objections for its contention that Negro families were becoming increasingly matriarchal and that family life among Negroes was disintegrating.

Although the report was first issued in 100 copies, it was later published by the Government Printing Office in the fall of 1965.

The report said 300 years of slavery and injustice had resulted in a "tangle of pathology" that would require a unified national effort to correct. Some Negro objections to the report, Mr. Moynihan said, actually put the blame on the Negroes for problems afflicting the race.

Negro objections to the report, Mr. Moynihan wrote in the Commentary article, contributed to the failure of the White House conference. He wrote:

"This time the opposition emanated from the supposed proponents of such a commitment: from Negro leaders unable to comprehend their opportunity; from civil rights militants, Negro and white, caught up in a frenzy of arrogance and nihilism; and from white liberals unwilling to ex-jections for its contention that Negro families were becoming increasingly matriarchal and that family life among Negroes was disintegrating.

But was not."

Furor Over Report

Mr. Moynihan stresses in the article that the furor over his report contributed to the failure to take advantage of the opportunity to win national support.

The reasons Mr. Moynihan cited for his belief that the nation was ready to follow Mr. Johnson's lead were that he had been "overwhelmingly elected the preceding fall and given the largest majorities in the House and Senate since those of the early Congresses that enacted the New Deal" and that the speech followed years of civil rights demonstrations in the South that were "unassailable in their justice."

"The timing here was perfect," Mr. Moynihan wrote.

He wrote that at the time the opposition to Negro advancement by Northern conservatives or Southern segregationists "would not have prevailed."

He quoted from a soon-to-be-published book titled "The Moynihan Report and the Politics of Controversy," by Lee Rainwater and William L. Yancey that said of the White House conference:

"It strongly disorganized the civil rights forces who in the end managed to bring about a show of unity only in opposition to the Moynihan report, not in effective demands on the Administration."

Lack of Resources

Mr. Moynihan adds:

"The essential fact is that neither the Government nor the civil rights movement had the resources to prepare a program in response to the Howard speech. This was the point of un-paralleled opportunity for the liberal community and it was exactly the point where that community collapsed."

The author was pessimistic about immediate progress for Negro aspirations in the United States because of the white backlash.

"It appears," he wrote, "that the nation may be in the process of reproducing the tragic events of the Reconstruction: giving to Negroes the forms of legal equality, but withholding the economic and political resources which are the bases of social equality."

He noted that white Americans generally feel that Negroes "have received enough for the time being."

Mr. Moynihan, 39 years old is director of the Joint Center for Urban Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

He is the co-author, with Nathan Glazer, of a book, "Beyond the Melting Pot," and is scheduled to publish a book on Negro family life in 1967. He ran unsuccessfully for president of the New York City Council in 1965.

A Commentary official said the article was Mr. Moynihan's first public statement on the controversy that began in 1965. The official said Commentary is an independent magazine of thought and opinion that is published as a public service by the American Jewish Committee.

"BLACK POWER"

George A. Chauncey

Several years ago there emerged within the civil rights movement a litany to be used at inspirational pep-rallies, in mass demonstrations, and while sitting in the paddy wagon waiting to be carted off to jail. In this litany the leader asked, "What do you want?" and the people responded, "Freedom!" The leader then asked, "When do you want it?" and the people responded, "Now!" In recent months, a slight revision in the litany has been made by certain civil rights workers. The answer to the when question is still the same: We want it now! But the answer to the what question has been revised. We want "black power"!

This revision of the accepted text has had, to put it mildly, an extraordinary effect on the racial situation in America. For one thing, it has touched off the most bitter debate within the Negro community itself since the days of Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. DuBois; and it has percipitated a serious split between the advocates of "black power" like Stokely Carmichael of SNICK and Floyd McKissick of CORE, on the one hand, and Roy Wilkins of the NAACP and Whitney Young of the Urban League on the other, with Martin Luther King somewhere in the middle as mediator. The slogan, secondly, has played right into the hands of white racists, giving them renewed opportunity to exploit historic and paranoiac white fears of "black domination." The slogan, thirdly, has provided moderate whites a ready-made excuse to discontinue support of the Negro's struggle. Practically every public figure worth his salt has felt compelled in recent months to lecture to the Negro community about the dangers of racism - in reverse; and some have even felt compelled to remind Negroes, rather pointedly, that in any showdown of power, they are in a distinct minority in American society. The slogan, finally, has baffled, offended, "hurt," disappointed, and dampened the enthusiasm of many genuinely liberal whites who now wonder, one, if they are still wanted at all and, two, if so, for what. What does this slogan mean? What's behind it? Why did it emerge? And what is our appropriate response to it? These are the questions to which this paper is addressed.

First of all, what does the slogan mean? Howard Moody, white pastor of the Judson Memorial Church in Greenwich Village, expresses the frustration many of us feel in trying to answer this question in these words:

> "...The ambiguity of the term 'black power' is... perplexing. Everything depends on where you were when you heard what words. The 'two faces' of Stokely Carmichael are sometimes very disturbing. When I see and hear him in a Harlem church engaged in incredible 'black' histrionics, I just want to run to my 'Whitey Survival Kit.' But when he writes about 'black power' in that 'decadent-white-intellectual' New York Review > of Books, I want to clip it out and send it to all the rich white liberals who have stopped financing the movement. Yet if the truth is faced, probably neither of these versions of 'black power' is complete."

It is obvious, given the ambiguity of the term and the complexity of the situation from which it has emerged, that hardly any white man, certainly not this white man, is in a position to explain "black power". Certain emphases in the on-going conversation, however, seem relatively clear to anyone who will listen seriously.

In its simplest - and to the white liberal "most acceptable" definition - "black power" means nothing more than a way to help Negroes develop racial pride and use the ballot for educational and economic advancement. The term has both a psychological and a political thrust. Psychologically, "black power," with its emphasis on "black consciousness," is an endeavor to develop a simple pride, self-esteem, and sense of dignity in being black. To understand why this seems necessary to advocates of "black power," we must ask what is wrong with the present racial consciousness in the Negro community. And the answer to this question - if such men as Richard Wright, Charles Silberman, and James Baldwin are right - is that most Negroes, far from being supremacists, are in fact ashamed of being Negroes. Negroes in America, and especially in the South, these authors say, have been taught for years that they are inferior, sub-human, lazy, good-for-nothing "niggers", characterized by an animal's passions and a child's mentality. This intensive brain-washing has had its psychologically-and-spiritually-crippling effect: Many a Negro in America today sees himself as the white man sees him - and is ashamed. One purpose of the "black power" advocates is thus to liberate Negroes from this immobilizing shame of themselves. Through an emphasis on "black consciousness," "black culture," and "black beauty" they hope to develop individual self-confidence and racial pride.

The other thrust of the "black power" movement is political. What I am seeking, Carmichael says, is "presence" for the black people. What this means essentially is that he wants them to be a force that white people will have to reckon with. The key issue - the only issue - in America today, he believes, is power. "The reason the Negro is in the position he's in today," he says, "is not because he's not integrated, but because he doesn't have power." "Black power," he adds, is a way - the only way - to deal with this problem. And what does "black power" mean in this context? It means organizing, pooling resources, and finding out just how strong black people are. "Like the workers in the '30s,'" he says, "like the Irish in Boston, we must demand the right to organize the way we want to organize. 'Black power' is a demand to organize around the question of blackness. We are oppressed because we are black. We must organize around that question."

Frank Millspaugh, a former civil rights worker who is sympathetic to Carmichael's concept, summarizes it in this way:

> "It has been SNCC's not very original observation that Negroes in the South do not have political power commensurate with their numbers. SNCC further believes that if Southern Negroes had such political power, their need for employment, better education, equal protection, and other amenities of modern life would be more rapidly and adequately met. Therefore, SNCC is attempting to create political units, based on Negroes' aspirations and depending on Negroes' support, which can become factors in political bargaining situations....

'SNCC calls this 'Black Power.'" This seems as American as apple pie, much more pacific than the Fourth of July, and it is perfectly legal, even in Alabama."

(Commonweal, 5 August 1966, p. 500).

Now, it should be clearly understood, as I have already indicated, that not all Negro civil rights leaders, by any means, are sympathetic to this new direction which SNCC and CORE are taking. Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, for example, declared at the annual meeting of that organization last July: "No matter how endlessly they try to explain it, the term 'black power' means anti-white power....It is a reverse Mississippi, a reverse Hitler, a reverse Ku Klux Klan... We of the NAACP will have none of this." (Crisis, August-September 1966, p. 354).

Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and organizer of the 1963 March on Washington, is another outstanding Negro critic. He contends in the October, 1966, issue of Commentary that "'black power' not only lacks any real value for the civil rights movement, but its propagation is positively harmful. It diverts the movement from a meaningful debate over strategy and tactics, it isolates the Negro community, and it encourages the growth of anti-Negro forces."

And seven well-known Negro leaders, including Wilkins, Rustin, Randolph, and Whitney Young (but not, significantly, Martin Luther King) recently purchased three-quarters of a page in the New York Times (October 14, 1966) in which to say, among other things: "We are committed to integration....We believe that a sense of personal worth and a pride in race are vital to integration in a pluralistic society, but we believe that these are best nurtured by success in achieving equality. We reject the way of separatism, either moral or spatial."

There is considerable disagreement in the movement itself about the wisdom and validity of Carmichael's call for "black power." We need to remember this. There is hardly any disagreement, however, as to the harsh social realities out of which the cry has emerged. We need, even more imperatively, to remember this. The issue was social injustice before "black power" became a slogan. The issue is still social injustice today.

The fact of life with which Carmichael, McKissick, King, Wilkins, Rustin, Young, and every other civil rights worker is confronted, you see, is this: Despite the many judicial and legislative victories which have been achieved in the past few years, Negroes today are in worse economic shape, live in worse slums, and attend more highly segregated schools than in 1954. They are in worse economic shape: More Negroes are unemployed today than in 1954. The gap between the wages of the Negro worker and the white worker is wider than it was in 1954. While the unemployment rate among white youths is decreasing, the rate among Negro youths has increased to 32%. And unemployment among Negro men - the one area in which there has been a slight gain - is still twice that of whites. The situation is equally distressing in housing. Despite numerous efforts at urban renewal (called by some cynics, "nigger removal"), the housing situation for Negroes in America is rapidly deteriorating; And even if the Civil Rights Act of 1966 had passed - which it did not because of its housing sections - there is reason to believe that it would have done very little good, because its housing provisions were considerably weaker than the anti-discrimination laws in several states which contain some of America's worst ghettos, even with these laws on their books. And so also with schools. According to figures recently issued by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, 65% of the first-grade Negro students in this country still attend schools that are from 90 to 100 per cent black. As Bayard Rustin has put it: "If in 1954, when the Supreme Court handed down the desegregation decision, you had been the Negro parent of a first-grade child, the chances are that this past June you would have attended that child's graduation from a segregated high school!"

To put all this in the simplest and most concrete terms: the day-to-day lot of the rural Negro of the South or the ghetto Negro of the North has not been measurably improved by all the judicial and legislative measures of the past decade. In spite of innumerable meetings, marches, and martyrdoms, in spite of countless arrests, beatings and other forms of brutality endured, in spite of all the blood, sweat, and tears poured out, the day-by-day life of the average Negro in Mississippi or Manhattan, Selma or Chicago, Atlanta or LA has not been affected.

This is the brutal reality that has created such bitter disappointment among Negroes. The failure of white Americans to use their power to deal with this brutal reality is what has created such widespread despair. And the profound suspicion that white Americans don't intend to use their power to deal with this brutal reality is the source of angry resentment. It is out of this disappointment, despair, and resentment that the call for "black power" has arisen.

How should the white Christian respond to this cry? I submit that there are at least four elements in an appropriate response. One is sympathetic understanding. "Black power" advocates are emphatic in saying they don't want the white man's sympathy, and they are surely right in rejecting all forms of paternalism, neo-and otherwise. Moreover, all of us who are white must recognize that we are white, and that we have not lived in black skins and borne the constant hostility of a dominant race. We cannot hope to fully understand what it means to be a black man in America. It is imperative, however, for us to understand as well as we possibly can what the situation is in America which fosters so much disappointment, despair, and anger.

A second element is gratitude: gratitude not for the frustration, despair, hatred and violence, but gratitude that the Negro in America today is freeing himself from the psychological servitude of our white expectations; gratitude that he is no longer allowing us to treat him as a thing and get away with it; gratitude that he is forcing us to reexamine our own attitudes and actions, our images and illusions.

A third element in an appropriate response is encouragement: encouragement of the Negro to become a force with which we will have to reckon; encouragement of him to limit the power of sin. Years ago Reinhold Niebuhr wrote a famous diction: "Man's capacity for justice makes democracy possible; but man's inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary." Remembering particularly the second half of this diction, we ought to welcome the emergence of other power to counter-balance our own.

The fourth and most important element in an appropriate response is work: work by which we do everything we possibly can within the white power structure, local, state and national, to effect those changes in our society which are required if we are to have equal opportunity in life as well as in law. It is our failure to do this work, and not the anguished cry for "black power," which has created the present crisis in race relations. And it is only as we do this work, only as we deal with situations out of which this cry has emerged, that justice can be established and reconciliation take place.

It is quite likely that the "race relations" in the next decade will be even more tense, painful, and agonizing than in the past decade. Whether ten years from now America looks more like a white-dominated police state or a truly democratic society depends to a great degree on what persons who are committed to the cause of justice and reconciliation do beginning now.

DR. KING TO PRESS ANTIWAR STAND

MOVEMENT

Says Vietnam Is the Major Obstacle to Rights Gains —Fears Summer Riots

NYT 3/24/67

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA, March 23 — The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. says the war in Vietnam has become the major obstacle to the civil rights movement and that he plans to take "a much stronger stand" against it.

"I feel it's playing such havoc with our domestic programs that I'm forced into [opposing the war]," Dr. King said in an interview.

The war has shifted attention and resources from the civil rights struggle, he said, adding that he believes civil rights programs will suffer less from his actively opposing the war than from not opposing it. The criticisms, he said, "will be much less than the frustrations and anxieties we will face in not opposing it."

Sees New Rioting

Dr. King will speak at an antiwar rally in Chicago next Saturday and then join his first antiwar demonstration in New York on April 15. He said the nation and President Johnson had become obsessed with the war.

Dr. King disclosed that he recently made plans for intensive organizing of Negro slums as a base to seek a guaranteed annual income and a nationwide campaign for economic improvement of Negroes through bargaining with major businesses.

"We have got to go all out to grapple with this economic problem," he said, talking of his plans for the first time since finishing a book about the racial struggle. Negro slums still retain explosive conditions, he said.

"Nothing much has changed," Dr. King said. "I'm afraid we're going to get a repetition of last summer."

Rioting erupted in Chicago, Cleveland, Omaha and several other cities in 1966.

Chicago again will be a target, Dr. King said, in an effort to "highlight or expose the problems of the ghettos through demonstrations." The demonstrations will center on housing and school segregation, he said, and might include marches by Negro pupils to predominantly white schools.

Dr. King described an agreement ending demonstrations last year in Chicago as "a marvelous agreement on paper."

"But nothing much has been done," he said. "And this only intensifies the feelings in the slums."

Open housing was the major issue in 1966.

Dr. King said disenchantment over the war, "intolerable conditions" in the slums and white backlash against civil rights programs were creating an atmosphere for turmoil.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which he heads, decided in recent meetings to concentrate on organizing slum residents, he said.

"We are bringing in about 50 solid organizers and we are going to have a workshop within the next three weeks to train them in the techniques of organizing," Dr. King said.

Chicago will be a primary target for this organizing, aimed at building "a base of power in order to bring enough pressure to bear to bring about a guaranteed annual income."

A second program, Dr King said, will seek to improve job opportunities for the Negroes through a nationwide program called "Operation Breadbasket." This program, which has worked in Atlanta and Chicago, involves bargaining with businesses for the hiring and promotion of Negroes.

Dr. King said clergymen from major cities would meet in May to set up the program. The first target, he said, probably will be a national company or product. If the bargaining efforts fail, then a boycott will be initiated, he said.

Dr. King brushed aside suggestions in recent months that the civil rights movement was dead.

"I think it is more alive than ever," he said, adding that his group's financial support was holding up.

He also discounted harmful effects of the black power movement and of divisions among Negro leaders.

Daley Charges Politics

CHICAGO, March 23 (AP)—Mayor Richard J. Daley contended at a news conference today that statements made by Dr. King were politically motivated.

Mr. Daley, a Democrat, is running for re-election April 4 against John L. Waner, a Republican, and Dick Gregory, Negro comedian who is seeking write-in votes.

Conference Explains Stand

A spokesman for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference said in a telephone interview from Atlanta yesterday that the conference had not taken "any formal position on the war recently," but that the views of Dr. King on the war were substantially those of the conference officials.

The spokesman, Thomas E. Offenburger, acting public relations officer, noted that the conference directors at their annual meeting in Jackson, Miss., last August had adopted a resolution opposing the Vietnam war because of its effects on the civil rights movement and antidiscrimination and antipoverty measures.

"We are a civil rights organization and we intend to carry out all of our civil rights programs," Mr. Offenburger said. "But Dr. King and other leaders of the conference do feel that they must speak out against the war, particularly as it affects the struggle for civil rights.

Dr. King, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964, has expressed increasing concern about the effects of the Vietnam war on Negroes. Last November, for example, he told a news conference at the University of Pittsburgh that the draft was unfair to Negroes.

Last January, the Rev. James Bevel, a close associate of Dr. King, was named national director of the newly formed Spring Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam. On March 16 it was announced that Dr. King had agreed to play a leading role in an antiwar demonstration that the committee had scheduled to be held outside United Nations headquarters here on April 15.

Shooting in Santo Domingo Brings Offer of a Reward

SANTO DOMINGO, Dominican Republic, March 23 (UPI)—The Government posted a $25,000 reward today for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those who attempted to kill Gen. Antonio Imbert Barrera earlier this week.

The general was shot and wounded while riding on a downtown street. His bodyguard, Marino Garcia, a former major, was also wounded.

Meanwhile, President Joaquin Balaguer named a retired general, Luis Amiama Tio, to be Interior Secretary of State. General Amiama Tio and General Imbert Barrera are the two surviving members of the team that killed Rafael L. Trujillo, the dictator, in 1961.

Mr. Balaguer also named General Amiama Tio as a member of a Government commission investigating the attempt of General Imbert Barrera's life.

War Called Unjust by King, Aides

(Copyright 1967 by The New York Times Co.)

LOUISVILLE, Ky.—The board of directors of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the national civil rights organization headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Thursday termed U.S. action in the war in Vietnam "morally and politically unjust."

The 60 to 70 member board, composed largely of Negro ministers, adopted a resolution that also said the war had "drowned the Negro's cry for equal rights."

RAP VIOLENCE

It is becoming difficult, the resolution said, for Negro leaders to preach "non-violence at home while our nation is practicing the very essence of violence abroad."

The resolution also said that the war is being fought by a disproportionate number of Negroes picked by "racially exclusive" draft boards and that President Lyndon B. Johnson, Congress and non-Negro Americans failed to understand "the frustration of a people asked to fight with all their life at stake for a nation which grants them only a partial life at home."

FIGHTING POOR

This nation, the resolution said, is in the contradictory position of fighting a war against poverty at home and fighting "a war against the poor" abroad.

"Rather than have the American dream slain in the jungles and swamps of Vietnam," the resolution said, "we pledge ourselves to do everything in our power to end that war."

Black Political Power Force May Be Powell's 3rd Party

BIMINI, Bahamas (AP) — Birth of a "black political power third force" that could become a third party was announced Thursday by Adam Clayton Powell and other Negro leaders meeting on this British resort island.

The ousted Harlem congressman, who lives in self exile here, told a news conference that a national campaign "to elect the black man" would be pushed.

Powell, jaunty in a yellow sport shirt and yellow shorts and smoking a yellow cob pipe, announced, "We are getting together as a team very soon, criss-crossing the nation from Washington to Berkeley, Calif., stopping at strategic points."

Appearing with Powell were seven U.S. Negro leaders.

A crowd of natives, who stood behind them, chorused "talk your talk baby" as Powell told newsmen, "We have faith in the black man and also in the young white man."

A national conference of elected Negro public officials will convene in Los Angeles May 26, Powell announced. He said he will be the keynote figure.

"The future of black political power is the future of the United States," Powell asserted. "I don't know if this is the beginning of a third party, but we are discussing that."

California State Senator Marvyn Dymally, representing the Watts area, said the new black political organization would be called "The National Conference of Negro Elected Officials."

Dymally heads a California group formed last month with 48 members as the forerunners of the national organization. He said the national group has a 500-member initial potential.

MOVEMENT

Dr. King's Error

In recent speeches and statements the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. has linked his personal opposition to the war in Vietnam with the cause of Negro equality in the United States. The war, he argues, should be stopped not only because it is a futile war waged for the wrong ends but also because it is a barrier to social progress in this country and therefore prevents Negroes from achieving their just place in American life.

This is a fusing of two public problems that are distinct and separate. By drawing them together, Dr. King has done a disservice to both. The moral issues in Vietnam are less clear-cut than he suggests; the political strategy of uniting the peace movement and the civil rights movement could very well be disastrous for both causes.

Because American Negroes are a minority and have to overcome unique handicaps of racial antipathy and prolonged deprivation, they have a hard time in gaining their objectives even when their grievances are self-evident and their claims are indisputably just. As Dr. King knows from the Montgomery bus boycott and other civil rights struggles of the past dozen years, it takes almost infinite patience, persistence and courage to achieve the relatively simple aims that ought to be theirs by right.

The movement toward racial equality is now in the more advanced and more difficult stage of fulfilling basic rights by finding more jobs, changing patterns of housing and upgrading education. The battlegrounds in this struggle are Chicago and Harlem and Watts. The Negroes on these fronts need all the leadership, dedication and moral inspiration that they can summon; and under these circumstances to divert the energies of the civil rights movement to the Vietnam issue is both wasteful and self-defeating.

Dr. King makes too facile a connection between the speeding up of the war in Vietnam and the slowing down of the war against poverty. The eradication of poverty is at best the task of a generation. This "war" inevitably meets diverse resistance such as the hostility of local political machines, the skepticism of conservatives in Congress and the intractability of slum mores and habits. The nation could afford to make more funds available to combat poverty even while the war in Vietnam continues, but there is no certainly that the coming of peace would automatically lead to a sharp increase in funds.

Furthermore, Dr. King can only antagonize opinion in this country instead of winning recruits to the peace movement by recklessly comparing American military methods to those of the Nazis testing "new medicine and new tortures in the concentration camps of Europe." The facts are harsh, but they do not justify such slander. Furthermore, it is possible to disagree with many aspects of United States policy in Vietnam without whitewashing Hanoi.

As an individual, Dr. King has the right and even the moral obligation to explore the ethical implications of the war in Vietnam, but as one of the most respected leaders of the civil rights movement he has an equally weighty obligation to direct that movement's efforts in the most constructive and relevant way.

There are no simple or easy answers to the war in Vietnam or to racial injustice in this country. Linking these hard, complex problems will lead not to solutions but to deeper confusion.

MOVEMENT

Calls It a 'Serious Tactical Mistake' to Merge Rights and Peace Drives—Fears Harm to Both Causes

NYT 4/11/67

The directors of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People voted unanimously yesterday against the proposal by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. to merge the civil rights and peace movements.

The 60-member board called Dr. King's plan "a serious tactical mistake." In a resolution adopted at its quarterly meeting here, the board said the effort to fuse the two movements "will serve the cause neither of civil rights nor of peace."

Dr. King, in a speech here last Tuesday, called on Negroes and "all whites of goodwill" to boycott the Vietnam war by becoming conscientious objectors to military service.

"A nation that continues year after year to spend more money on military defense than on programs of social uplift is approaching spiritual death," Dr. King had asserted.

The N.A.A.C.P. resolution stated as follows:

"Civil rights battles will have to be fought and won on their own merits, irrespective of the state of war or peace in the world.

"We are not a peace organization nor a foreign policy association. We are a civil rights organization. The N.A.A.C.P. remains committed to its primary goal of eliminating all forms of racial discrimination and achieving equal rights and equal opportunities for all Americans.

"We are, of course, for a just peace. But there already exist dedicated organizations whose No. 1 task is to work for peace just as our No. 1 job is to work for civil rights."

The statement, which did not mention Dr. King by name, was the first by the group on the war in Vietnam. Last week, Whitney M. Young Jr., director of the National Urban League, said the peace and civil rights movements had different goals and that it would be inappropriate to merge them.

Time for Declaration

The N.A.A.C.P.'s director of public relations, Henry Lee Moon, asked whether the resolution had been intended as a reply to Dr. King, said:

"We felt it was time to make a declaration, to make our position clear."

Dr. King's speech also drew criticism yesterday from Senator Jacob K. Javits, Republican of New York:

"It's certainly bound to be resented," Senator Javits said, "by the country which is deeply involved in the war and which feels it can certainly do justice by the Negro at one and the same time."

Dr. King could not be reached for comment.

King's Dual Role Attacked by Bunche

MOVEMENT By JOHN SIBLEY AC 4/13/67

(Copyright 1967 by the New York Times Co.)

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.—Dr. Ralph J. Bunche asserted Wednesday that Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. should not try simultaneously to lead the civil rights movement and the crusade against U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

"In my view, Dr. King should positively and publicly give up one role or the other," declared Bunche, the U. N. undersecretary for political affairs. "The two efforts have too little in common."

King, replying later to Bunche and other critics, challenged them to "take a forthright stand on the rightness or wrongness of this war, rather than going off creating a non-existent issue."

KING REPLIES

At a news conference in Los Angeles, King stated:

"No one can pretend that the existence of the war is not profoundly affecting the destiny of civil rights progress."

Bunche said he was commenting not as an official of the United Nations but as a U. S. citizen. He is a director of the NAACP. The NAACP's 60-member board voted unanimously on Monday to oppose the effort to merge the civil rights and peace movements.

Bunche disclosed in an interview Wednesday that it was he who had moved to toughen the language of the NAACP resolution by denouncing the merger attempt as "a serious tactical mistake."

He added that Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers and another NAACP director, supported his proposal.

NOT AN ATTACK

The phrase "serious tactical mistake" had occurred to him immediately, Bunche remarked, "because I had planned to use it in a speech I was supposed to make last Thursday at the University of Chicago."

Bunche stressed that he was not attacking King for the position he has taken on the U.S. role in Vietnam. His undelivered Chicago speech said of King:

"He is, after all, an active clergyman and naturally sensitive to moral issues and values. But he should realize that his anti-U.S.-in-Vietnam crusade is bound to alienate many friends and supporters of the civil rights movement and greatly weaken it—an ironic twist for a civil rights leader."

REFUSES STAND

Bunche declined to state whether he agreed with King's assertion that Negro troops are in Vietnam "in disproportionate numbers" and are suffering more than their share of hardships, injuries and deaths there.

to speak out on Peace

In recent weeks some of the press has headlined several attacks on Dr. King's expressions on peace. Most people do not have an opportunity to read rebuttals which are always less prominently presented. They are particularly important because more than a few of the attacks were based on misconceptions of Dr. King's positions. An example is Dr. Bunche's criticism which was trumpeted on T.V. & Radio and beneath monster newspaper headlines. When Dr. Bunche withdrew his criticism with characteristic forthrightness and speed, his remarks were almost universally ignored by the press.

I think you will find this small sampling of perceptive observations as fascinating as I did and these reprints may help to redress the imbalance in the way news commentary reaches us.

Another Opinion

Dr. King's Moral Stand

The following defense of Dr. Martin Luther King's anti-Vietnam war stand was written by James P. Brown, an editorial writer for The Providence Journal. It appeared in that paper last week as the column One Man's Opinion under the title "Dr. King's Critics Don't Understand."

Dr. King's critics don't understand the situation. They don't understand Dr. King. They don't understand the civil-rights movement. They don't understand the war in Vietnam. Above all, they fail to perceive the moral thread that ties this man and these causes inescapably together. . .

. . . Although Dr. King's estimates of civilian deaths in Vietnam may be exaggerated, there can be no question in the mind of any reasonable person that American forces in Vietnam, no matter how honorable their intentions, are heaping hideous destruction on many thousands of innocent people. Although Americans are not committing the deliberate atrocities that the Nazis committed, our leaders have argued that our ends in Vietnam justify means that are clearly contrary to conscience. We once condemned Hitler for embracing this immoral doctrine.

Compelled to Speak Out

As to the harm Dr. King's unpopular stand on Vietnam may do the civil-rights cause, this is, indeed, tragic. It would have been expedient for Dr. King to keep silent. But Dr. King is not just another Negro fighting for his rights. He is a minister of God, a disciple of the Prince of Peace and of Gandhi. His leadership of the civil-rights movement springs from his moral integrity, not from his skill as a political tactician. As a man of conscience, he is compelled to speak out against the wrong of the Vietnam war just as he has been compelled to stand against the wrong of racial injustice. . . .

Until recently, racial injustice was the central moral issue confronting the conscience of Americans. This issue remains. But it is being overshadowed, and in many ways adversely affected, by the larger moral issue posed by our actions in Vietnam.

There are many for whom it would be expedient not to speak out against the Vietnam war. Politicians, businessmen, teachers, clergymen, editors —all might argue that they have other important tasks that would be compromised if they embraced this unpopular cause. This is no excuse for silence.

Explaining his own strong stand on the Vietnam issue in a recent issue of the Yale Alumni Magazine, Yale Chaplain William Sloane Coffin Jr. wrote:

"Now let us suppose that a man has conscientiously done his homework on the war in Vietnam, and that his homework has led him to the following conclusions: that while it is true that we are fighting Communists, it is more profound to say that we have been intervening in another country's civil war; that despite the billions of dollars of aid, the heroic labor and blood of many Americans, the Saigon Government from Diem to Ky has been unable to talk convincingly to its people of national independence, land reform and other forms of social justice; that the war is being waged in a fashion so out of character with American instincts of decency that it is seriously undermining them (which is not to say that the V.C.'s are Boy Scouts, which they clearly are not); that the strains of the war have cut the funds that might otherwise be applied to anti-poverty efforts at home and abroad (which is the intelligent way to fight Communism); and finally, that the war would have a good chance of being negotiated to an end were we to stop the bombing in North Vietnam.

"If a man's homework leads him to these conclusions, then surely it is not his patriotic duty to cheer or stand silent as good Americans die bravely in a bad cause. . . ."

Like Mr. Coffin, like Rhode Island's Rev. Albert Q. Perry and a growing number of other religious leaders here and elsewhere, Dr. King has answered the call of a higher power. He has put his body on the line.

As We See It

Dr. King Strengthens An Anti-War Coalition

HE RECALLED HOW this nation first became involved in Vietnam and got on the "wrong side of the world revolution" by sending aid in 1945 to the French who were seeking to perpetrate colonial rule over what was then Indochina.

He quoted from the Epistle of Saint John on the power of love.

He recited lines from a poem by James Russell Lowell:

Once to very man and nation
Comes the moment to decide
In the strife of truth and falsehood
For the good or evil side . . .

Thus, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. called on Americans to protest this nation's war in Vietnam. In a major address at Riverside Church in New York, the Negro civil rights leader committed himself to a crusade against a war which he says is immoral in many ways.

He went further than many Americans opposing the war may be willing to go; he went further than this newspaper is willing to go. He advocated a boycott of the war effort and suggested that draft-age men declare themselves conscientious objectors.

But his stand holds clear political implications.

Dr. King articulates latent Negro opposition to a war which Negroes feel takes a disproportionate number of their sons to the jungles of Vietnam, which diverts the nation's attention from civil rights problems and its coin from the tasks of rebuilding cities and improving the lot of the ghetto dwellers.

Dr. King bases his dissent from the Johnson administration's Vietnam policies on "the mandates of conscience and the reading of history." He asserts that in Vietnam "we are adding cynicism to the process of death . . . We are on the side of the wealthy and the secure while we create a hell for the poor. Somehow this madness must cease. We must stop now."

According to Dr. King this nation should atone for its sins and errors by taking the initiative in bringing peace. He proposes five things for the government to do:

- End all bombing in North and South Vietnam.
- Declare a unilateral cease-fire in the hope of creating an atmosphere for negotiation.
- Curtail military build-ups in Thailand and our interference in Laos to prevent new wars.
- Accept the fact that the National Liberation Front, the political arm of the Vietcong, has considerable support in South Vietnam and must play a role in its government.
- Set a date for removing all foreign troops from Vietnam as required by the Geneva Accords of 1954.

If the Johnson administration may consider Dr. King's proposals wholly unacceptable, this newspaper does not. Nor, we trust, will others. His proposals are similar to ones put forward by world leaders in other capitals; they comply with the terms of the Geneva Accords which the administration so often insists it is only seeking to implement.

Dr. King's speech is important for reasons other than his specific criticisms or his suggestions. It is important because it signals what may become widespread Negro opposition to the Vietnam war.

If it comes, this Negro opposition will not be isolated. Much of the nation's intellectual community—its articulate university scholars and students—also oppose the war and these campus-oriented groups may become more active in the months ahead. On Monday this newspaper reprinted a hard hitting speech in which Emil Mazey, secretary-treasurer of the United Auto Workers, vigorously criticized the war and urged the administration to take new peace initiatives and to attach no preconditions on negotiations.

The Negroes. The liberal intellectuals. The labor movement.

These groups helped form the coalition which has kept the Democratic Party in power for most of the last third of a century.

The implication Dr. King's speech holds is that the Vietnam war may become an even larger issue for Americans in the months ahead and that the old Democratic coalition may remain fairly solidified but no longer in the Democratic Party as led by President Johnson.

It's an implication Gov. Romney, as he prepares his remarks on the Vietnam war, ought to weigh.

The Color of War

MAX LERNER

It is important to get it settled in our thinking once and for all: Is the Vietnam war a war of color or isn't it? If it is, then the belief of American Negroes in it is bound to be seriously compromised. If it isn't, then all that talk about its being a white man's war fought by black men is inexcusably irresponsible.

The current debate about the color of the war has been swirling around Dr. Martin Luther King, but it is unfair to tag him with it. What King did was to lend his voice and moral backing to the mass anti-war demonstration at the UN Plaza and in Central Park. Without him the speakers' list would have been a good deal thinner in substance, and the crowd not as massive. But King's views on the color of the war are different from those of Floyd McKissick and Stokely Carmichael. The difference is an important one.

King says that the Vietnam war is immoral because it involves no American national interest that couldn't have been negotiated short of war. It is a perfectly defensible position, no different from that of Sen. Fulbright. It is also understandable how King, holding this view, should say that the war is linked with the civil rights movement—that the absorption with so expensive a war means less money and less psychic energy available for civil rights and the inner city. If King were white, not black, no one could deny his right to make this connection. Why then fault him as a black? Why ask him to decide which movement—peace or civil rights—he wants to fight for? Clearly he wants to fight for both.

I find this kind of talk, as well as the talk about American genocide, pretty dreary. The war is bad enough without distorting it to make it worse than it is. You can be against the war on a variety of grounds, but when you see it as a war of color you give a wild intensity to color hatreds, and you sharpen that line of color militancy which alone can divide America and set human being against human being in a senseless irrational color struggle.

As for King himself, it was inevitable that he should broaden out from his civil rights leadership to an anti-war militancy. As a Nobel Peace Prize laureate he couldn't stay out of the peace movement, especially when so many of his fellow clergymen are active in it. . .

. . . There have been disputes about the size of the New York demonstration, whether it was a hundred thousand or a quarter of a million or more. Yet what counted about it was not only its size but the fact that it was held, and that most of the people who came to it were not either color-conscious or politics-conscious, but only wanted to make their presence felt for peace.

Dr. King knows this, and knows how to avoid being used. But can one say this equally about some of the people at whose side he spoke, in a very different language?

THE NATION April 24, 1967
Combined with FRONTIER

Dr. King is certainly no firebrand, and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference has served as a bridge between the moderate civil rights organizations, such as the NAACP and the Urban League, and the militant Congress of Racial Equality and Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Hence, as in all such cases, the chastisement begins with a tone more in sorrow than in anger, in the hope that the erring sinner, having learned his lesson, will return to the fold. Dr. King's "friends" have spoken of his "tragic" (or "monumental") mistake, the "sorrowful occasion" which compels them to part from him, the "grave injury" he has done to the civil rights movement and to himself. "Many who have listened to him with respect," The Washington Post editorializes, "will never again accord him the same confidence." His usefulness, in this view, is all but over, unless he repairs quickly to the mourners' bench.

What has happened, what is going to happen, tells much about Dr. King as a man and a moral leader; it tells even more about the Establishment. What did its officers expect him to do? Stand still, with summer coming up and tensions rising? The more sensible voices among those who deplore Dr. King's declaration are compelled to concede that the civil rights movement has been stymied, and that the war, if not the sole cause, is the principal one. So once again they expect the Negro to wait, despite the fact that the President could (The Nation does not advocate it), by imposing wage and price controls, carry on both the war and civil rights programs. But that would reduce the prospects for a continuance of profit at the level to which business has become accustomed—the more so because some slight faltering in the onrush of "prosperity" has become evident. This course does not appeal to Mr. Johnson, who, under his Populist cloak, is about as business-minded a President as any we have had in this century. Thus we behold once more the familiar spectacle of pseudo-liberalism seizing on a war in order to avoid expenditures it never liked and to which it yielded only under duress.

The leaders of the moderate civil rights organizations have played along with the powers that be, hoping to placate them and to receive a measure of continued support, while giving their own members an impression of practicality merged with aggressiveness. This dual role Dr. King has now made more difficult, and the leaders don't like it.

One of the biggest myths of U.S. politics, and the most convenient for the Establishment, is that foreign policy has no relation to domestic need. The fact is, quite apart from Vietnam, that one cannot push a reform movement as significant as the Negro's demand for full equality, and at the same time pursue a policy which makes us the world's policeman. The whole history of the civil rights movement shows the incompatibility. In the darkest days of the cold war, say from 1947 to 1955, Negro rights were shelved. There were splendid opportunities, as when Eisenhower came into office in 1952 and the Supreme Court made its decision in Brown v. Board of Education in 1954, but he did not act, nor did Congress. The 1955-65 decade saw a slight breather in the cold war, enough to make civil rights gains possible. Now, with the deepening involvement in Vietnam, things are at a standstill once more. The whole history refutes King's critics.

Equally to the point, King spoke because he cannot play fast and loose with the moral issues which American power and the zooming technology of war have forced on public notice. He could not urge his people to practice nonviolence in the streets of American cities and condone violence in the jungles and rice paddies of Vietnam. It is significant that the NAACP did not attack King's moral stand, only his operational strategy. They would like to keep moral conviction and public action apart. But the time is past when the separation could be maintained. The partition has been broken, and it will not be rebuilt.

The critics who were never friends of King's, and who never made common cause with him, are more severe than those who have lost an ally—and the storm is only beginning. We are told that in proposing a boycott of the war he is stopping just short of sedition. The next step will be to accuse him of outright sedition, which is the verbal form of treason, and to try to shut him up. Dr. King has offered himself as the symbol of the moral force which got him his present prominence and the Nobel Prize. The imminent showdown may well center upon him. Whatever the consequences may be for King himself, the issues will be clearer for Negroes and whites alike by the time the voters go to the polls in 1968.

Letters to the Editor of The Times

Dr. King's Peace Stand Supported

To the Editor:

By commenting as it did in the editorial "Dr. King's Error" (April 7) The Times has, in my estimation, committed an error it will want later to rectify and done an unfortunate disservice to a great American and a great Christian.

Perhaps you allowed Dr. King's harsh charges ("recklessly comparing American military methods to those of the Nazis") to distract you from the main thrust of his action. The objection, however, to his "fusing of two public problems that are quite distinct and separate" has an odd ring to it, coming as it does from a newspaper which has always stressed integrity and the indivisibility of freedom.

The two issues are fused in Dr. King because he is a man of peace who said on April 2: "It would be very inconsistent of me to teach and preach nonviolence . . . and then applaud violence when thousands of thousands of people, both adults and children, are being maimed and mutilated and many killed in this war."

The reason Dr. King says "the Great Society has been shot down on the battlefields of Vietnam" is not because he contests your assertion that "the nation could afford to make more funds available to combat poverty even while the war in Vietnam continues." It is rather because he knows that Congress will not make more funds available so long as this war continues. Dr. King uses the old Biblical saying: "where your treasure is, there will your heart be also," and maintains that the heart of Congress and of the Administration is in this war.

The Times says Dr. King has every right and obligation to explore the ethical implications of the war "as an individual," yet it is only "as an individual" that he has spoken out. He has not committed the Southern Christian Leadership Conference as an organization to participate in any action. Moreover, his reasons for speaking out go far beyond his feeling that "the two issues are inextricably bound together" and his insight into "the interrelatedness of racism and militarism." It is because, as he says, "I love America" and "want to see our great nation really stand up as the moral example of the world."

It is because he wants "to arouse the conscience of the nation . . . so that at least we can move more and more toward a negotiated settlement of that terrible conflict . . . and it is out of this moral commitment to dignity and the worth of human personality that I feel it is necessary to stand up against the war in Vietnam."

Quite rightly Dr. King insists "the United States must take the first steps, I mean the initiative, to create an atmosphere for negotiation. . . ."

Are we, as a nation, so lacking in self-confidence, courage and faith that we, in all our might, cannot bring ourselves to launch such a crucial initiative?

DR. KING DISAVOWAL ACCEPTED BY BUNCHE

Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., April 13—Dr. Ralph J. Bunche said today he accepted "at face value" the disavowal by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. of any effort to merge the civil rights movement and the campaign against United States involvement in Vietnam.

Later in the day, speaking in Los Angeles, Dr. King declared:

"We do not believe in any merger or fusion of movements, but we can equally believe that no one can pretend that the existence of the war is not profoundly affecting the destiny of civil rights progress."

Dr. Bunche, in a statement today, responded:

"I am very happy to see this statement by Dr. King." Dr. Bunche added:

"So far as I'm concerned—and I speak only for myself—Dr. King's disavowal of any such intent takes care of the issue to which my statement had been directed."

An Un-Patriot?

JAMES A. WECHSLER

In a small, crowded room at the Biltmore, three hours before Gen. Westmoreland delivered his pep talk at the Associated Press luncheon not many blocks away, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King was reaffirming his refusal to be intimidated by the flag-waving binge foreshadowed by the Westmoreland mission here.

The occasion was a news conference to announce the largest coalition of religious, civic and public leaders so far organized in protest against U.S. escalation in Vietnam. It is launching a campaign under the slogan "Negotiation Now"—with cessation of our bombings described as the first step.

Presumably Gen. Westmoreland was unaware, when he applied the label "unpatriotic acts" to home-front dissent, that such groups as the National Council of Churches, the Unitarian Universalist Association and the Christian Citizenship Dept. of the Episcopal Church had joined hands with SANE, ADA, the Friends Service Committee, the American Jewish Congress and numerous others in broadening the base of the anti-escalation movement.

There has been a concerted drive in recent weeks, quietly encouraged by Administration spokesmen, to isolate King as a "far-out" figure and depict him as the captive of the fringe unilateral-withdrawal faction. His designation as major spokesman for the new coalition was an answer to that attack.

King's agreement to undertake the assignment reflected his own resolve to impart an ecumenical quality to the anti-war protest. He is deeply convinced there is a great unease in the country about the war. While he recognizes, as he sadly observed yesterday, that there are also many who favor new and more adventurous military action, he believes that "never in the history of our nation" have so many Americans been afflicted by conscientious doubts.

Inevitably he was asked about the charge that peace marches may reduce rather than enhance Hanoi's willingness to negotiate a settlement.

"I am sure that our bombings do much more to harden resistance in Vietnam than any peace demonstration possibly could," he said quietly. He conceded he could offer no assurance that a bombing-halt would lead to negotiations, but he noted that both U Thant and Soviet spokesmen have said that it would.

"We can take the chance because of the vast power we have as a nation," he said. Then, almost as if anticipating Westmoreland's rhetoric, he said solemnly: "I speak not out of a hatred for America but a love for America. We have morally and politically isolated ourselves from much of humanity . . . I want to see us set a moral example."

Some pro-Administration journalists have again written King's obituary. It has been said that his involvement in the Vietnam conflict has fatally injured his stature as a civil rights leader. Yet he remains a curiously resilient figure with a special capacity for communicating with wide varieties of people. His judgment now is that the war shadows all other events, and that no one with any pretension to leadership can ignore its existence. And non-violence remains his fighting faith.

To those who say he should have stuck to his civil rights role, he answers: "I don't believe in segregating any principles."

Letters to the Editor of The Times

Dr. King's Place in Civil-Rights Tradition

To the Editor:

Dr. Martin Luther King's argument that the war in Vietnam has precluded meaningful attempts to cope with poverty and discrimination at home may or may not be correct. His conclusion that, as a civil-rights leader, he must therefore oppose that war may or may not be wise. But the implication made by many of his critics that, as a civil-rights leader, Dr. King departs radically from precedent in speaking out against American foreign policy, cannot bear historical examination.

The fact is, though some seem to have forgotten it, that many of the initial leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were men who devoted much of their public careers openly to attacking American foreign policy. The first president of the association, Moorfield Storey, assumed that office already known as a persistent critic of the American acquisition of the Philippines.

While serving as president between 1910 and 1929, Storey continued his anti-imperialism, publicly condemning American interventions in the Dominican Republic, in Haiti, and in Nicaragua.

No Criticism of Leaders

Oswald Garrison Villard, the first treasurer of the association, was one of the stanchest critics of the Treaty of Versailles and remained an opponent of "foreign entanglements" throughout his life. Though the situation of the Negro American was even more perilous then than now, neither Storey nor Villard was, to the best of my knowledge, attacked for speaking out on foreign-policy issues while serving with the association, nor was it suggested that their positions somehow hurt the cause of civil rights.

But it has also been forgotten that the precedent of a civil-rights organization, as an organization, criticizing American foreign policy, was set not by Stokely Carmichael and the Student Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee, let alone by Dr. King, but by the N.A.A.C.P. through its executive secretary, James Weldon Johnson, in connection with the American occupation of Haiti. The intervention in Haiti and the intervention in Vietnam may be different in intent, but surely they are equally "foreign policy"—as distinguished from "civil-rights"—issues.

Whatever the merits of Dr. King's position, in short, he stands in a solid historical tradition when, as a civil-rights leader, he speaks out against American foreign policy.

A CLOSING NOTE . . .

Although SCLC engages its primary attention in civil rights, its board unanimously supports Dr. King's right to speak as well as his position on the war. We do not feel that Dr. King will injure the civil rights movement by his stand on peace. He believes the civil rights movement stands on its own merits and does not believe people will withhold support from it, nor give support to it, based on his positions on peace. His integrity and moral leadership would both be corrupted if he kept a dishonest silence.

Since he believes the existence of the war is profoundly damaging domestic democratic progress, both his sense of responsibility and his moral conscience impel him to express his views even as he continues unabated in his vigorous civil rights work.

Wilkins Views Issues

Another 'Long, Hot Summer?'

BY AL KUETTNER

New York (UPI) — "Thousands of young Negroes will be turned loose from school this summer with muscles in their arms and mischief in their minds. We must find jobs for them or we are going to have trouble."

Speaker: Roy Wilkins, executive director of the 460,000-member National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People.

Time: May, 1967.

Will it be another "long, hot summer" of street rioting, as predicted by racial leaders with less optimism and more militancy than Wilkins?

"All the ingredients are there, but I don't think it has to happen," Wilkins said in an exclusive interview with United Press International in which he touched on wide-ranging aspects of the civil rights movement.

Eager to Work

Wilkins feels there must be aggressive cooperation at all levels of government and business to make available jobs on a massive scale to young Negroes, who, he insists, are now qualified and eager to work.

"Last summer the unemployment among Negro teen-agers was 32 per 100 as against 14 per 100 for whites," he said. "All I can say is that if this summer you have one out of three Negro teen-agers wandering around, you are going to have trouble. You better find jobs."

In his annual manpower report to Congress last week, President Johnson called for "new directions" in hiring policies to absorb many of the 2 million unemployed in the nation. He said they were mainly school dropouts, minority groups and older and handicapped workers.

Assails War Link

Wilkins denounces in strong terms efforts by such leaders as the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Stokely Carmichael of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee to link their organizations with get-out-of-Vietnam drives.

"Civil rights is our business and that's all we have a right to be as organizations," he said. "I don't care what a per-and do everything possible to see that it is."

On the peace movement controversy involving some Negro leaders:

"I have no comment on a man's moral reaction to the war. But I urge the American people not to judge what a John X says about the draft law in judging what 20 million American Negroes should have in the form of equal employment opportunities.

"Cassius Clay is a very skillful championship boxer. It is a pleasure to watch him fight. But I refuse to accept him as a symbol of 20 million Americans. . .

"The Negro in this country has a history of loyalty in wartime. He knows he hasn't gotten a square deal from his country but nevertheless it's his country.

"I think that tactically, whether he intended it or not, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. has diverted the energies and attention of the Negro population and his friends among whites from civil rights as the central issue to war and peace.

"This is regrettable. I prefer to keep my feelings about this war out of the discussion of civil rights. If you mix the two together or try to tie them together, you do a disservice to both. (The King stand) is confusing our followers so that, when you call on the public for help on this civil rights bill, they say, was 32 per 100 as against 14 per 100 for whites," he said. "All I can say is that if this summer you have one out of three Negro teen-agers wandering around, you are going to have trouble. You better find jobs."

In his annual manpower report to Congress last week, President Johnson called for "new directions" in hiring policies to absorb many of the 2 million unemployed in the nation. He said they were mainly school dropouts, minority groups and older and handicapped workers.

Assails War Link

Wilkins denounces in strong terms efforts by such leaders as the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Stokely Carmichael of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee to link their organizations with get-out-of-Vietnam drives.

"Civil rights is our business and that's all we have a right to be as organizations," he said. "I don't care what a person thinks as an individual."

Wilkins, whose organization was banned in Alabama for several years, gently scoffs at former Gov. George Wallace who has boasted that "most Negroes" in his state voted for his wife when she was elected governor recently. He feels Wallace is using misleading figures.

No Plans to Retire

Wiry and alert at 65, Wilkins shows no signs of retirement. At present, he is marshalling forces for the new civil rights bill and beginning to map strategy for the Negro's role in the 1968 presidential election.

He views President Johnson as the "most sincere" chief executive on civil rights in history.

Wilkins apparently has weathered a "young Turk" storm that could have sent the NAACP ship onto the rocks a few years ago. Negro youths accused the organization of selling out to the white power structure and of being satisfied with status quo for the 11 percent of the U.S. population who are Negroes.

Civil Rights Views

On issues swirling around the civil rights theme, Wilkins had this to say:

On the summer ahead:

"I hope it will be mild. Trouble will be at a minimum if cities will do what they should on minority rights — especially on teen-age jobs. But much work still needs to be done on civil rights. Our job is far from over."

On the new civil rights bill which expands voting, employment and housing privileges for Negroes:

"This new act is intended to tidy up those already passed . . . a kind of clean-up operation. We feel optimistic that we can get the act passed this summer (a similar effort failed last year).

"You ask if it will take more demonstrations to obtain a new act; I hope not. We expect Congress to move on the urgency of the situation. I must say that the mood of the Negro population is one of skepticism with regard to relief through legislation.

"There is a common expression that the only time the responsible white power structure as they call it—and I hate the term—the only time it moves is when there is a riot. I would hate for that to be proved true this year.

"We will work very hard to see that this bill is enacted can Negroes should have in the form of equal employment opportunities.

"Cassius Clay is a very skillful championship boxer. It is a pleasure to watch him fight. But I refuse to accept him as a symbol of 20 million Americans. . .

"The Negro in this country has a history of loyalty in wartime. He knows he hasn't gotten a square deal from his country but nevertheless it's his country.

"I think that tactically, whether he intended it or not, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. has diverted the energies and attention of the Negro population and his friends among whites from civil rights as the central issue to war and peace.

"This is regrettable. I prefer to keep my feelings about this war out of the discussion of civil rights. If you mix the two together or try to tie them together, you do a disservice to both. (The King stand) is confusing our followers so that, when you call on the public for help on this civil rights bill, they say, 'Well, isn't this the gang that was against the Vietnam war?' "

Views on Wallace

"As to Mr. Wallace's desire to run for president, I think the answer is simple. There is a strong feeling in this country against what they call 'big government' and a strong feeling that 'we can do it better than they can down there in Washington.' This doesn't have anything to do with civil rights and it is not a feeling confined to one region.

"Mr. Wallace thinks he can exploit that feeling.

"I also feel that it would be pertinent for Mr. Walllace to cite the predicament of the Negroes in Alabama if he's trying to sell his brand of racial equality to the rest of the country—how do they stack up, what jobs do they have, how are their schools, what process of integration takes place? The fact is, the situation of the Negro is not good in Alabama."

Powell Issue

On the issue of Adam Clayton Powell:

"It occurred at a most unfortunate time. It was a diversion on the civil rights front at the very time the new Congress was organizing, when new lines were being formed, when strategies were being developed. The Negro population was outraged and I feel personally justifiably so at the treatment accorded Adam Clayton Powell. But we wasted the whole first quarter of 1967 arguing about Adam."

On President Johnson's support of the civil rights movement:

"At the risk of being termed a Johnson stooge, I will have to answer in the affirmative. My contacts with the President and the facts on what he has done lead me to believe he is the most sincere President on this issue, has said more and done more and pointed out more areas for correction than any President in history."

On black power:

"I saw where the dean of students at Columbia called it 'romantic nonsense.' The fact is this is a slogan, and slogans never solved any economic, social or political problems."

Appropriations Panel Seeks Southern Votes to Block a G.O.P. Substitute for Johnson's School Aid Plan

SCHOOL DESEG

By MARJORIE HUNTER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 11—A House Appropriations subcommittee has tentatively agreed to Southern demands for Congressional curbs on school desegregation guidelines.

The move is a part of the backstage maneuvering now under way as the Administration's school aid bill, delayed for nearly a month, heads for a showdown on the floor the week after next.

Southern Democratic votes will be crucial in the Administration's effort to block a Republican substitute bill.

While Democrats outnumber Republicans, 247 to 187, the 83 Democrats from the 11 Southern states hold the balance of power.

The Administration bill proposes a $3.5-billion one-year extension, starting in July of next year, of programs of aid to elementary and secondary school children, primarily those in poverty areas. The Republicans ha proposed a substitute under whcich lump sum grants would be given to the states.

In return for their votes, Southern Democrats have held out firmly for some relief from school desegregation guidelines.

The principal move in this direction is expected to come from the House Appropriations subcommittee, which allocates funds for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The subcommittee is prepared to bring out a money bill that would bar the use of Federal funds for achieving percentage desegregation goals—a key element in the school desegregation guidelines.

Under the Office of Education's desegregation guidelines, school systems that are 8 or 9 per cent desegregated are expected to double that rate this year, while districts with a lower desegregation rate are expected to make "proportionately greater efforts to catch up with the leaders."

Southerners have bitterly protested that use of percentages or quotas, violates the section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 under which the use of the law to correct "racial imbalance" is forbidden.

If integration quotas are set in the South, the Southerners argue, then Southern school systems will be expected to have more integration than their Northern counterparts.

Just this month, the Supreme Court refused to delay enforcement of a top-to-bottom school desegregation decision handed down last month by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

The Court of Appeals, in its 8-to-4 decision, had ruled that it was possible for the Office of Education to use percentages without violating the civil rights act.

Despite the ruling, Southern efforts to hamstring the school desegregation guidelines are expected to win final approval in the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Health, Education and Welfare and perhaps in Congress as a whole.

Backers of the plan insist that it would not constitute an effort to legislate within the framework of an appropriations bill.

They argue that the crackdown on guidelines will merely be a reieration of Congressional intent under the Civil Rights Act of 1964. They point out that the act specifically said that "desegregation shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance."

Southerners also are expected to wage a strong—and possibly successful—floor fight to amend the Administration's school aid authorization bill to provide further relief from the guidelines.

Democratic leaders have virtually agreed to accept one Southern proposal that would require a hearing in advance on any move to delay Federal funds to a school district suspected of practicing discrimination.

The House adopted an identical amendment last year, by a vote of 220 to 116. However, it was switched around in Senate-House conference to provide a 90-day limit on Federal deferment of funds.

Two administrative actions within the Department of Health, Education and Welfare this week have also been viewed by many as timely efforts to woo Southern support for the embattled school aid bill.

One action, in effect swept the power of Harold Howe 2d, the United States Commissioner of Education, to enforce desegregation guidelines by cutting funds to noncomplying schools.

The move, announced yesterday, places all civil rights enforcement activities within the office of John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

Until now, various bureaus within the department have administered civil rights enforcement in conjunction with their programs—public health, education, vocational rehabilitation, aging and welfare.

Mr. Gardner said that he had acted under a year-old instruction from the House Appropriations subcommittee which handles his department's funds. While the subcommittee's instructions are not law, Executive departments generally follow them to avoid the difficulties over their budgets.

The move was generally viewed as well-timed to soothe Southern complaints.

Mr. Gardner said that he had acted under a year-old order from the House appropriations subcommittee that handles his department's funds. However, the move was generally viewed as well timed to soothe Southern complaints.

Although some Southerners expressed satisfaction today over the shifting of guidelines enforcement away from Mr. Howe, they said that this alone would not win them over to the Administration's school aid bill.

Another administrative move, announced just this week, involves use of Southern educators to serve as desegregation compliance officers in hardcore Southern school districts this summer.

Last summer, about 100 law students most of them from the North, were hired to work with and investigate Southern school districts having trouble with desegregation orders. Many Southern superintendents and principals complained that the young law students were arrogant and did not understand Southern desegregation problems.

CORE LEADER GETS FELLOWSHIP HERE

Innis to Study City Problems Under Ford Grant

By EARL CALDWELL

Roy Innis, militant leader of the Harlem chapter of the Congress of Racial Equality, yesterday became the first civil rights fellow-in-residence of an organization that analyzes urban and civil rights problems.

Announcement of Mr. Innis's selection was made after the Ford Foundation had granted $500,000 to the organization, the Metropolitan Applied Research Center.

The center also announced that Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and one of his chief aides, the Rev. Andrew Young, secretary-treasurer of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, had agreed to take part in the fellowship program.

The fellowships, which offer new services to civil rights leaders, were announced by Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, the social scientist who is also president of the organization.

One of Seven Grants

The grant to the center was the largest of seven announced by the Ford Foundation yesterday. All were to aid various civil rights and antipoverty programs.

According to Dr. Clark, fellowship-in-residence to Mr. Innis, an outspoken advocate of black power, is for six months, but is renewable.

The civil rights fellowships are designed to give the leaders the opportunity to evaluate their programs and tactics and to indulge in long-range planning.

During the fellowship period, the center is making available to the civil rights figures its professional research staff, consulting social scientists and other services that many of the activists—particularly those at the local level—do not normally have.

Community and Education

Mr. Innis, who has taken leave from his position as a chemist at Montefiore Hospital to accept the fellowship, will use his time to study community organizations as related to problems of education.

Dr. King and Mr. Young, because of the demands on their time, have flexible agreements with the centre as to the use of their fellowships.

Dr. Clark said he had also discussed similar fellowships with other civil rights leaders, including Floyd McKissick, national director of CORE; Stokeley Carmichael, head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, and Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The New York Times

GRANTED FELLOWSHIP: Roy Innis, chairman of Harlem CORE, is Metropolitan Applied Research Center's first civil rights fellow.

Dr. Clark said the Ford Foundation funds would enable his group to grant four academic fellowships to social scientists and three student internships.

'Valuable Experience'

One of the academic fellowships has already been granted to Dr. Hylan Lewis, professor of sociology at Howard University. He is directing the fellowship and internship programs.

Dr. Clark, who is on leave from his post as professor of psychology at City College, declined to predict the impact this program would have on the civil rights movement, but he said that "in terms of individuals, it would seem to be a valuable experience."

He said the fellowships would give civil rights activists some scholarly perspective, and give scholars more insights into practical civil rights activities.

First Lady Returns to Capital

Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson returned to Washington yesterday afternoon on an Eastern Air Lines shuttle after a brief visit here. She had come Wednesday and attended a concert at Carnegie Hall for retired employes of hte International Ladies Garment Workers Union. She received an award that evening from the Citizens Committee for Children of New York at a dinner at the Hotel Pierre.

Carmichael Calls LBJ 'Hunky and Buffoon'

WASHINGTON (UPI)—Stokely Carmichael, linked by the FBI to a secret Marxist-Leninist group dedicated to overthrowing the government, says President Johnson is a buffoon leading a nation of murderers and cowards.

Carmichael made the statements during a peace rally Tuesday night just hours after it was disclosed that FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover had told Congress about Carmichael's alleged connections with the subversive group.

Addressing 1,000 persons at a mobilization for peace meeting, Carmichael called the President a "hunky"—a derisive term for a white man—and urged young men to go to jail rather than fight in Vietnam.

"We're going to eat their jail food and call them better fed than dead," Carmichael said. He repeatedly referred to Johnson as a "hunky" and a "buffoon" in his address.

IN TESTIMONY before a House panel that was made public Tuesday, Hoover said Carmichael has been "in frequent contact with Max Stanford, field chairman of the Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), a highly secret all-Negro, Marxist-Leninist, Chinese Communist organization which advocates guerrilla warfare to obtain its goals."

RAM "is dedicated to the overthrow of the capitalist system in the United States, by violence if necessary," Hoover said, "and its replacement by a socialist system oriented toward the Chinese Communist interpretation of Marxist-Leninism."

Hoover also noted that the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, which Carmichael headed until his recent resignation, had taken an active stand in opposition to U.S. participation in the Vietnam war.

CARMICHAEL SEES REVOLUTION NEAR

MOVEMENT

Tells Coast Parley Negroes Are Past Talk of Reform

5/28/67

By EARL CALDWELL

Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, May 27—Stokely Carmichael told a wildly cheering all Negro audience last night that Negroes could "no longer talk about reform" but were "going to have to talk about revolution."

Mr. Carmichael, former national chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, called for the forming of more "self-defense groups" in keynoting the California Black Conference on the Survival of Black People.

Nearly 1,200 Negroes from across the state crowded the Jefferson High School auditorium in the Watts District of Los Angeles, still scarred from racial disorder two summers ago, for the opening session of the three-day conference.

Wilfred T. Ussery, national chairman of the Congress of Racial Equality, said that the conference was designed to find ways of meeting "the growing threat of black people."

Threat Discussed

In discussing this threat, he Ronald Reagan, a conservative Republican, as Governor of California and Lester G. Maddox, a Democrat whom he called a gun-wielding racist, as Governor of Georgia. Mr. Ussery of San Francisco, chairman of the conference, said that more than 1,000 delegates had been registered.

The delegates and speakers represent a spectrum of views in Negro communities across the state, from militant nationalist philosophies to moderate civil rights stands.

A few hours before he delivered his address, Mr. Carmichael was denounced as "an Uncle Tom" by a Communist group that picketed the conference.

About 30 young Negroes, membere of the Los Angeles branch of the Communist party of the U.S.A., carried signs in front of the school urging Negroes to join an armed revolution in the United States.

The demonstrators also ridiculed other Negro leaders, including Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Democrat of Manhattan; Floyd B. McKissick, executive director of CORE, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Michael Laski and Eston Simmons, two of the organization's national officers, made speeches outside the school to "expose these elements who say they are revolutionaries." The demonstration ended before Mr. Carmichael arrived.

The news media were barred from the opening session of the conference but were permitted to interview participants at news conferences.

Mr. Carmichael, wearing faded blue denims and an overall jacket, said Negroes had "a duty and a responsibility" to wage a revolution "if we must."

He predicted that if Israel and the United Arab Republic went to war "the United States will be in it the next day." He said that the United States would support Israel but that "nobody in Snick is going to fight for any white man."

He said that the question Negroes must consider was is whom they were going to fight for. He indicated that H. Rap Brown, the new national chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, would outline his position in a later appearance at the conference.

'67 Christmas Stamp Doubles Displeasure

WASHINGTON, May 26 (AP)—The Post Office announced Friday that the 1967 Christmas stamp would be the same as last year's but twice the size.

And the American Civil Liberties Union said its opposition to issuance of the stamp would be twice as strong as it was last year.

But whether the liberties group will be joined in its protest this year by all the Jewish organizations that opposed issuance of last year's stamp was uncertain.

The Post Office said the new stamp was a five-color reproduction of Memling's "Madonna and Child with Angels." Last year the stamp was .75 by .87 of an inch. This year it will be .84 by 1.44 inches.

Licensing of Nurses Spreads

Mandatory licensing of both registered and practical nurses is spreading in the United States, Medical World News reports. Maryland is the latest state to pass a bill creating a state board to license and set standards for the nurses. This brings to 37 the number of states with licensing for registered nurses and 16 the number that license practical nurses.

RIGHTS GIFTS LAG, DR. KING REPORTS

MOVEMENT

But N.A.A.C.P. Funds Rise, as Do Urban League's

5/28/67

ATLANTA, May 28 (AP)—The public opposition of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. to the Vietnam war has cost the civil rights organization he heads some financial support, but he says that new contributors aligned with the peace movement have offset part of the loss.

Two other civil rights organizations, responding to a survey by The Associated Press, reported revenue on the rise; two others said that little cash had been added to their already depleted treasuries.

"We are in fairly good shape, Dr. King said, speaking of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

"I think we are in a rather difficult period right now," said his executive assistant, the Rev. Andrew J. Young. "But we are not worried. We're getting along."

Mr. Young said support had fallen off among civil rights supporters who objected to Dr. King's linking of the movement with the protest against the war.

Dr. King's proposal that the two movements cooperate drew sharp criticism from some Negro leaders, notably Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Dr. King has denied he wants a "mechanical merger," but he has said that Vietnam and civil rights are matters of conscience that tie together the two movements.

In a speech in New York on April 4, he denounced United States involvement in Vietnam and called for a unilateral cease-fire by the United States.

Now he has taken a leadership role in Vietnam Summer, a nationwide project to mobilize antiwar sentiment. He says the war effort has diverted both national attention and funds from civil rights and antipoverty programs.

Dr. King said that generally the contributors he had lost were those who made $5 donations while he had gained some $500-a-donation supporters. However, neither Dr. King nor Mr. Young could, or would, provide details of the organization's financial condition.

The leadership conference had a record budget of $1.5-million in 1965, but trimmed this to $1-million in 1966. At Dr. King's suggestion, the staff was cut from 150 to 85. Most of the discharged employes were low-paid workers, some of them students.

"We're now running at the rate of about $1-million for this year's budget," said the public relations director, Tom Offenburger.

"We're now running at the rate of about $1-million for this year's budget," said the public relations director, Tom Offenburger. Generally, whatever comes in is spent, he said.

"While we're not in danger of going out of existence, neither do we have the money to do what we need to do," Mr. Young said.

Of the other civil rights organizations, the N.A.A.C.P., which is the oldest, and the National Urban League, the quietest, report improving financial support.

However, the foremost "black power" groups, the Congress of Racial Equality and the Student NonViolent Coordinating Committee, still are struggling for money.

The student committee, which in the last year lost much of its college campus following, may have picked up additional support recently.

Committee Is Silent

Its officials wouldn't talk to a reporter, but an informed source said the organization's money problems had been eased by Stokely Carmichael's college speeches and fund-raising projects. The source said a recent fund-raising affair in the home of a New York sculptor had produced "at least $10,000."

"I don't think Snick is getting a lot of money," the source said, "But it is doing better."

However, Mr. Carmichael has been replaced recently as chairman of the student committee and it is not known if he will continue his fund-raising projects.

CORE'S financial problems were illustrated dramatically on May 10 when Walter S. Brooks, its director in Baltimore, announced that his office was to be closed because there was no money to pay rent or utility bills.

In a handwritten news release, Mr. Brooks said CORE's 1966 target city project, aimed at Baltimore, was $3,000 in debt and that his office had been self-sustaining since January.

CORE's national director, Floyd B. McKissick, charged that Mr. Brooks had spoken without authority and said the Baltimore office would not close.

But, Mr. Brooks said, "We have appealed to all but the racists, and now there is no longer electricity to run off this release."

In New York, Don Smith, the CORE public relations officer, said income had improved slightly in recent months.

CORE Cuts Debt

By early May, CORE had reduced its indebtedness to about $137,000, Mr. Smith said, compared to the $400,000 debt of February, 1965.

"There may be reason for looking up," he said.

The projected spending of the N.A.A.C.P. for 1967 is $1.9-million—about $250,000 higher than last year. Over-all income has been about the same as in 1966, said John A. Morsell, assistant executive director.

However, there is a rise in at least one area. The N.A.A.C.P. said recently that its $500 life memberships had grown from 14,001 in 1963 to 22,147 by the end of last year.

The Urban League has not been affected in its fund-raising by either Dr. King's antiwar stand or black power; it opposes both.

Guichard Parris of New York, public relations director, said the league's income had increased.

In the last fiscal year, the league had an income of $2.37-million, and it now expects an operating budget in the current fiscal year, ending June 30, of $1.8-million, plus special project funds of about $2-million, Mr. Parris said.

Baptist Church Is Thriving In Soviet, Official Reports

WASHINGTON (AP) — Despite Communist restrictions, Baptist churches in the Soviet Union continue to thrive, the Rev. Dr. Josef Nordenhaug, general secretary of the Baptist World Alliance, reported after a visit there.

Russian Baptists form the largest Baptist group in the world outside of the United States, he wrote in The Baptist World. He said there were an estimated total of 550,000 members in 4,500 Baptist congregations, which hold overflow services as often as six times a week, some of the services lasting up to three and a half hours

CORE Chairman Assails Anti-Riot Bill

7/2/67 NYT

By EARL CALDWELL
Special to The New York Times

OAKLAND, Calif., July 1 — In a speech filled with emotion, Floyd B. McKissic called on CORE's annual convention last night to "do something" about the antiriot legislation that is now being considered by Congress.

Mr. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality, said that the bill was "not designed to stop Stokely Carmichael but to stop black people."

He called the violence that has flared in Negro ghettos across the country not riots, but "rebellions by black people."

Then, with tears streaming down his face, Mr. McKissick shouted that "these are black people who say "get off my neck, treat me like a man'."

The antiriot bill of which Mr. McKissick spoke cleared the House Judiciary Committee this week. It is expected to win approval after Congress returns on July 10.

If passed in its present form, the bill would make it a Federal offense for anyone moving to cross state lines with the intent "to incite, promote, encourage or carry on a riot or other violent civil disturbance."

The hard-hitting speech, delivered before an aroused crowd of nearly 3,000 persons in Oakland's Civic Auditorium, came during the convention's opening session, which was to have been keynoted by the former heavyweight boxing champion, Cassius Clay.

But the fighter, convicted last month of refusing to comply with the draft, ended up as CORE's honored guest and was presented with a special award.

As it turned out, Mr. McKissick was the keynoter.

He told the convention that an organized plan was underway to "castrate any black man who stands up for the truth."

And he said that black people all over the country had a stake in whatever happens to Stokely Carmichael, the black-power advocate. "The young militants must exist and they must live," he said.

Clay Offers to Help Poor

Clay, who prefers the Moslem name of Mohammad Ali, told the convention that he would put his boxing title—stripped from him by boxing organizations—on the line "against anyone" this fall and that he would give all the proceeds to help feed poor, "starving" Negro children in the South.

He made the offer after Dick Gregory, the Negro comedian, had produced a copy of a study made for the Field Foundation, detailing the effects intense poverty has had on poor youngsters in the South.

Mr. Gregory told the convention earlier that he planned to make a trip "around the world" to "try and beg money from other nations" to purchase food for the needy in the South. He said that he would visit every country that received aid from the United States and "every Communist country that I can get into." It was at this point that the deposed boxing champion stepped forward and made his offer.

Mr. Gregory said later that he would join immediately in working out the details for such a fight.

Mr. McKissick presented Clay with a plaque on behalf of CORE, honoring him as "one of the great Americans, if not the greatest living American in the country today."

Delegates to CORE's convention turned today to the scheduled business of making the slogan "black power" a working program.

Seek Alliances, Rustin Urges Negroes at Fisk

By ROB ELDER

The civil rights movement is not dead, but it has moved from the drama of the decade 1955-1965 into a period of politics in which Negroes must seek alliances, Bayard Rustin said here last night.

Addressing the 24th annual Race Relations Institute at Fisk University, the veteran civil rights leader declared that "the period of protest" must now be replaced with programs which can deal with jobs, schools and housing.

AND BECAUSE these issues affect not only Negroes, he said, Negroes cannot deal with them by using the separatist methods preached by "black power" advocate Stokely Carmichael.

Aiming his remarks at members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee who were in the audience, Rustin, Executive Director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, said:

"If Stokely and his ilk believe this society is ever going to do anything special for Negroes, they are profoundly wrong.

"We have got to have allies. You must remember that alliances are not built on affection, as if you were choosing a girl friend. Five out of six alliances must be made with people you're going to have to call bastards next week."

THE TRADE UNION movement, he said, is the Negroes' "most fundamental ally, and the vicious attack on it by Negroes is basically stupid."

Negroes must say to the unions, he said, "that we do not agree with the black power people — who have no program anyway — that there is no place for whites."

The present period of politics is more difficult than the period in which protest could be effective, Rustin said, because national consensus on civil rights has disappeared, and because the press, interested in the new, the sensational, and in conflict, can no longer be expected to "make the movement."

RUSTIN, FOR seven years special assistant to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., noted that King was the symbol of the protest period, when "he who walked most, was arrested most, and was brutalized most became the symbol of the movement.

"But not Dr. King or anyone else" can become the symbol of political programs, he said.

The civil rights movement, he went on, has entered "truly a new period" in which "we have got to put forth a concrete, objective, achieveable program"—a task which he said is "tedious and irksome and dry as dust, and newspapers do not print it."

RUSTIN CALLED for "a $2 minimum wage right away," full government - sponsored medical care and "guaranteed work" to provide jobs for all citizens.

Bayard Rustin
'Achievable programs'

He drew laughter when he quoted a statement by U.S. Sen. Robert Kennedy on water pollution and said the poverty program could provide meaningful jobs by "helping the rich who have yachts" and assigning "hundreds of thousands" of young men to clean up the nation's rivers.

The entire poverty program and educational system must be revised, he said, to "redefine study as something you work at and get paid for." Until the head of the Negro family is given economic security, he declared, "We will accomplish nothing."

DURING THE following questions and answer period, the gray-haired speaker perched on the back of a chair and listened patiently to long rebuttals from three young people who defended Carmichael's "black power" approach.

The three identified themselves as Delano Farrar of Boston, Ronald Green of New York and Eileen Carpenter of Nashville. Farrar and Green said they are members of SNCC, while Miss Carpenter said she is not a member.

Farrar told Rustin that if he expects approval of the "Freedom Budget" proposed by the speaker, "you're out of your mind."

"BUT YOU keep your dream," the young man added.

Replied Rustin:

"I know very well the Freedom Budget is not going to be passed tomorrow morning. But yes, I have a dream . . . my dream is that the American people are educable. . . .

"And I have faith in you, and all the more so because you stand up and challenge me," he added to the young man.

WHEN MISS Carpenter repeatedly insisted that economics is not the heart of the problem, and that Negroes can unite against racism, Rustin gently told her:

"No, my dear, all Negroes cannot get together. The problem with Negroes is that they're just like white people. I know it's ugly, but it's true."

Finally, after Green again defended Carmichael's "black power" approach, Rustin noted:

"People who are really anticipating power never discuss it."

Race Institute Told

Superficial News Tied to Rights Riots

NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
July 5, 1967

By ROB ELDER

Superficial news reporting is partially responsible for violence in the civil rights movement, Dr. Herman H. Long, president of Talladega College, told the Race Relations Institute at Fisk University yesterday.

Long, a former director of the institute and a member of the race relations department at Fisk until he became president of the Alabama college, said the mass media twist interpretations of civil rights developments to fit "formula interpretations."

FORMULAS often used by newspapers, radio and television, he said, include "the prediction of violence," emphasis on "vulnerability" and "divisiveness" among Negro leaders, and "the self-fulfilling prophecy of white backlash."

The result, he said, "is that the immediate elements of a conflict situation are distorted far beyond their importance." Negro leadership strategy is created on the basis of these formula interpretations, and this has "in a sense led to legimitazation of violent methods as a real choice for some Negro leadership groups."

Challenged by some members of the institute audience who argued, in a question and answer session, that violence is an "effective means of social change," Long insisted that such arguments are oversimplified, and that justification of violence by Negroes on grounds that whites use violence "is a negative argument."

CONFRONTED, however, with questions from one woman who insisted Negroes will be "slapped down" until they use violence, Long explained:

"My non-violence doesn't extend that far. If someone hits me. I hit them back."

His statement drew applause from the audience.

IN ANSWER to another question, Long said "black power" has "essentially the same logical consequences" as white supremacy. "It leads to segregation — to separation," he said.

He criticized adult Negro leaders for failing to confront what he termed the "quote, 'new left,' " movement among Negro students, and for leaving "the initiative on the other end."

Any concept of Negro power as "absolute" is an illusion, Long declared, explaining that Negroes must exercise political strength in balance of power bargaining with the community as a whole.

"BLACK POWER," he said, "remains a generalized, highly emotional slogan" without any clearly defined means or ends. It "tends to be divisive since it has taken on some of the language which has attempted to divide the Negro community on a class basis," he said.

For example, Long explained, "black power sloganeering tends to cast suspicion on (Negroes) who may just happen to be educated, or just happen to be doctors or dentists, or just happen to own small businesses."

He cited the "gross failure" of the press to meaningfully interpret civil rights news, adding that "I would guess part of this failure has rested upon a dependence on conflict and pathology as constituting the nature of what news is.

"IT IS almost as if the good things do not constitute news," he added. "The total effect has been the resort to formula reporting which reflects the most superficial and transitory elements of a situation."

Long also criticized the press for "so-called Negro leader stories" which quote persons who may be unknown in the Negro community as "Negro leaders."

Earlier yesterday, Vernon E. Jordan, director of the Southern Regional Council's Voter Education Project, told the institute that student civil rights activity from 1960 and 1964, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, have been great forces in increasing Negro voter registration in the South.

ANOTHER CAUSE, he said, has been the Voter Education Project itself.

In the face of such progress, he predicted, white southern "racist" politicians will make "a determined effort to change the rules in the middle of the game."

"The Negro vote will be gerrymandered and offices likely to be won by Negro candidates will be abolished. There will be a shift away from district elections toward citywide and countywide elections in which Negro votes are diluted," he said.

It is the votes of Southern Negroes which will determine the future of Negroes in the North, Jordan declared.

"But," he said, "we can ill afford to harbor the romantic notion that today's more complicated and more demanding issues can be met by Negroes acting alone. Alliances and coalitions, perhaps more diverse and imaginative than any before, will be needed."

Herman Long
"I hit them back."

Schedule

Here is today's schedule for the Race Relations Institute at Fisk University:

8:30 a.m. "Prospects of the Traditional Negro College," Lionel H. Newsom, Southern Regional Education Board.

10:30 a.m. "Human Relations Education in Adjusting to Social Change," Andrew Torrence, Tuskegee Institute.

The institute is being held in Park-Johnson Hall on the Fisk campus.

NAACP Reports Membership Hike

MOVEMENT

BOSTON (UPI)—The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) reported Saturday a slight increase in membership and a "more substantial" gain in income despite "diversionary activity" by some civil rights groups including "black power" advocates.

The NAACP in its annual report issued on the eve of its 58th annual convention, said 1966 was a year of "creeping despair" in which "black power" evoked "widespread concern among both Negro and white citizens."

The report said Stokely Carmichael's "black power" concept was "alienating" the civil rights struggle because of its "separatist and sometimes violent connotations." The report frowned on "young black activists" who seek "refuge in racial isolation."

The NAACP, the nation's oldest and largest civil rights organization, opens its weeklong convention Monday with an anticipated 2,000 delegates in attendance.

Highlights include the keynote address Monday night by NAACP Executive Director Roy Wilkins and the awarding of the NAACP's 52nd Spingarn Medal to Sen. Erward W. Brooke, (R) Mass., the nation's first popularly elected Negro senator. The medal is awarded annually to "a man or woman of African descent and American citizenship who has made the highest achievement during the preceding year in any honorable field of endeavor."

THE NAACP report described its membership increase as "minor" but said it came in the face of "diversionary activity on the part of some forces which had formerly given support to the fight for freedom.

"Because all the hopes of 1963-65 had not been fully realized, there were those — particularly among the newcomers to the movement — whose chagrin nurtured frustration and defeatism and generated a hazy belief that the movement was headed toward disintegration," the report said.

While membership and financial support for some of the newer civil rights groups was on the decline, the NAACP said, the organization's membership as of Dec. 31, 1966 was 441,169 as compared to 440,538 in 1965. Total income for the year was $2,228,127 as compared to $1,957,321 in 1965.

The major source of income in 1966, "as in former years, was from the association's predominantly Negro membership," the report said.

"Although the membership increase was minor," the NAACP said, "it loomed large against the background of creeping despair."

Seek N.A.A.C.P. Debate on Black Power and War

BOSTON, July 12—Opponents of Roy Wilkins are working the lobbies of the 58th annual N.A.A.C.P. convention in the hope of forcing a floor debate on black power and the war in Vietnam.

Their aim is to make the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People more militant and to curb Mr. Wilkins's power as executive director of the organization.

Resolutions to these effects have been circulated in the corridors of the Sheraton Boston Hotel, where the convention is being held, but unless the critics find a way of circumventing the regulations, there appears to be little hope that the resolutions will get to the floor.

The regulations require that resolutions must have the approval of at least 10 members of the 50-member resolution committee before the committee will consider them.

As of today the most optimistic estimate was that eight members of the resolutions committee were prepared to recommend that the committee reconsider them.

At past conventions, critics of Mr. Wilkins's authority would arrive confident of blocking the executive director only to be completely frustrated by the Wilkins organization.

Four groups were said to be trying to break through the barriers—the Greenwich Village-Chelsea branch in New York City; a branch of Witchita, Kan., a California branch and the Philadelphia branch.

A Greenwich Village-Chelsea resolution summarized the aspirations of Mr. Wilkins's critics.

One part denounced the Vietnam war, demanded the cessation of bombing, urged the withdrawal of United States forces and insisted on international supervision

At past conventions, critics of Mr. Wilkins's authority would arrive confident of blocking the executive director only to be completely frustrated by the Wilkins organization.

Four groups were said to be trying to break through the barriers—the Greenwich Village-Chelsea branch in New York City; a branch of Witchita, Kan., a California branch and the Philadelphia branch.

A Greenwich Village-Chelsea resolution summarized the aspirations of Mr. Wilkins's critics.

One part denounced the Vietnam war, demanded the cessation of bombing, urged the withdrawal of United States forces and insisted on international supervision of free elections.

Another section described black power ideology as respectable and while not endorsing it, insisted that the attacks on it cease. Finally, the resolution demanded that Mr. Wilkins be prevented from criticizing other civil rights leaders publicly without consulting the N.A.A.C.P. board of directors.

Mr. Wilkins has persistently opposed either involving the N.A.A.C.P. in controversies over United States foreign policies or in tying in the rights movement with foreign policy.

Last year at the Los Angeles convention, he bitterly denounced black power as an invitation to murder.

Mr. Wilkins has almost full powers and the confidence of the majority.

Since his election as executive director in 1955, he has built up a powerful bureaucracy that is loyal to him. The board of directors support him because it shares his view of the role of the organization. The regulations minimize the possibility of a successful challenge to the authority of the executive director.

In his keynote address last Monday, Mr. Wilkins appeared to have defeated his opponents when he praised the usefulness of militants in "shaking up" the Negro and white communities in the United States. He refrained from attacking black power advocates or even mentioning black power ideology by name.

Despite the criticism of Mr. Wilkins as being too moderate, the executive secretary appears to have become more militant and bitter by reports of delays or outright opposition to the implementation of the civil rights laws. In his address Mr. Wilkins warned that obstructionist tactics by rights opponents would result in more violence.

Last night Senator Edward W. Brooke, Republican of Massachusetts, the first Negro to win a popular election to the United States Senate, repeated this warning in his speech to 5,000 persons who filled the Great War Memorial Auditorium.

Senator Brooke, always considered a moderate, said that obstructionism was an invitation to violence. He placed the responsibility for the mounting tensions in the ghettos on the failures of the Federal, state and municipal governments to enforce the rights laws.

N.A.A.C.P. Enjoined

Justice Gerald P. Culkin of the New York State Supreme Court enjoined the N.A.A.C.P. yesterday from amending or revoking the charter of its Philadelphia branch pending a hearing by the group's national board of directors.

Justice Culkin issued the injunction on the application of Cecil B. Moore, the president of the Philadelphia branch, who is often at variance on policy matters with the national leadership of the civil rights group.

Several weeks ago, the N.A.A.C.P. announced that it was planning to establish other chapters in Philadelphia in what was viewed as an attempt to reduce Mr. Moore's powers. He had argued that the establishment of new chapters without first holding a hearing violated the group's Constitution.

Black Power Parley To Seek Negro Unity

MOVEMENT

By EARL CALDWELL

Plans were disclosed yesterday for a national conference on black power that promises to bring together for the first time the many diverse elements of the Negro community.

The four-day meeting is scheduled to convene on Thursday, July 20, in Newark.

The Rev. Dr. Nathan Wright Jr., chairman of the conference, called the forthcoming meetings "an assembly of black Americans" designed to "set our own house in order and to work for the unity of black people and the greatest good for all Americans."

Dr. Wright, who is director of urban work for the Episcopal Diocese of Newark, said that only Negroes would be admitted as delegates to the conference.

However, he pointed out that certain sessions would be "open to the public" and that no whites would be barred from these meetings.

According to Dr. Wright, the conference will bring together not only the so-called Negro moderates but also advocates of black nationalism and the militants in the civil rights movement.

In addition to civil rights groups, Dr. Wright said, Negro educators, politicians, students, clergymen, labor leaders and antipoverty staff workers will also attend the conference.

In discussing the significance of the conference, Dr. Wright pointed out that "one of the sources of powerlessness of the Negro community is the fact that it has been historically divided." He said that "this gathering represents unification of a magnitude never before encountered among black people in this country."

The idea of the meetings was developed last September at a meeting in Washington called by Representative Adam Clayton Powell.

Dr. Wright said that Mr. Powell was still an honorary co-chairman of the conference along with Representative Charles C. Diggs, Democrat of Michigan, and Floyd B. McKissick, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality.

Dr. Wright said he had received word "within the last 10 days" that Mr. Powell would attend the conference and that he would speak during one of the scheduled open meetings.

Although a complete agenda for the conference sessions was not released, it was disclosed that workshops would deal with such topics as "The City and Black People," "Black Power Through Black Politics," "Black Power and American Religion," "New Roles for Black Youth" and "Black Power Through Economic Development."

Dr. Wright said that James Farmer, former national director of CORE, would act as honorary chairman of a three-day workshop exploring "new forms of cooperation and alliance."

Although many of the so-called "big names" in the civil rights movement were not listed as participants in the conference, Dr. Wright pointed out that staff personnel from both the Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were expected to attend as delegates.

"There are advantages and disadvantages in not bringing in great personalities," he explained. "This is primarily a think session."

CROSSROADS SEEN ON NEGRO RIGHTS

MOVEMENT

Riots Viewed as Leading to Repression or Massive Aid

NYT 8/6/67

By M. S. HANDLER

Some prominent liberals long identified with the civil rights struggle believe that the widespread Negro riots may drive white Americans into choosing between massive repression or the mobilization of national resources and skills to bring the Negro people into the mainstream of American life.

These men, each a recognized authority in his field, agree that the short-term outlook is gloomy. They differ about the long-term outcome.

The liberals also differ on the question of whether the established civil rights organizations still posses enough credibility in the urban ghettos to enable them to lead, or if a new type of "hard-nosed" leadership will have to come from the big business community before the march toward civil rights and equality can be resumed.

Their views were gathered through telephone interviews and, in the case of two men in Detroit, through conversations in person.

Genocide Is Feared

Prof. Philip M. Hauser, University of Chicago sociologist and director of the university's Population Research Center, said that nobody could predict today whether white America would choose repression or a march toward equality.

But, he added, if white America should choose repression there are "inherent" possibilities in such a choice of transforming the inner ghettos into concentration camps guarded by the police, the National Guard and Federal troops "Repression by the whites could eventually lead to genocide," he said.

Harold C. Fleming, president of the Potomac Institute, Washington, D.C., a nonprofit research agency to promote equal opportunity, said that a spirit of defeatism was spreading among many of the more liberal people who have supported the civil rights movement.

He agreed with Professor Hauser that there had been no national commitment by the Government and white America to support moderate Negro leadership.

Professor Hauser charged that the Government had undermined the moderate leadership of the National Association of civil rights groups and liberals.

Prof. C. Vann Woodward, Sterling Professor of History at Yale University, said he believed the coalition had collapsed before this summer's riots.

Professor Woodward, a leading authority on the Compromise of 1876 and the long repression of the Negroes that followed the withdrawal of the Union forces of occupation from the Southern states in 1877, explained:

"The old coalition on which we depended for civil rights progress collapsed after the Civil Rights Bill was passed in 1965 and went to pieces in 1966. The movement was based on the fulfillment of old promises and when this came to pass the movement came to an end.

"It is difficult to answer about new leadership in the United States. I beleive the N.A.A.C.P. and the National Urban League still have enough credit to carry on. The impact of the extremists in Newark has been exaggerated."

Despite the probable unfavorable short-term reaction of white America, Professor Woodward believed that there was hope for the time when people have evaluated the impact of the upheaval on the social fabric of the country.

A more optimistic note was struck by Morris B. Abrams, president of the American Jewish Committee. Mr. Abram, a lawyer who has been active in public service and the civil rights movement, said that one of the most hopeful aspects in the situation was capacity of Americans to forget their anger quickly.

He cited a saying attributed to the late Gov. Alfred E. Smith to the effect that the United States was a "10-day country"—that is to say, that everything can be forgotten in 10 days.

said that nobody could predict today whether white America would choose repression or a march toward equality.

He agreed with Professor Hauser that there had been no national commitment by the Government and white America to support moderate Negro leadership.

Professor Hauser charged that the Government had undermined the moderate leadership of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Urban league and was thereby turning over leadership to men such as Stokeley Carmichael and H. Rap Brown, the black power advocates.

Mr. Fleming went a step further than Professor Hauser. He said that the established civil rights organizations "are bankrupt so far as communicating with the people in the ghettos, where they have no credibility. We have pulled the rug from under them."

Warns of Warfare

He added that he believed there was still a chance of restoring the position of the moderate leaders, but he said:

"If we can't we will have to confine ourselves to sporadic guerrilla warfare. This is horrible to contemplate. It is most important we do what we can with the peaceful elements."

Nevertheless, Mr. Fleming expressed confidence. He said:

"There is some reason to hope that out of this crisis there may be the beginning of a new reaching out of people that will have an effect on the Government and Congress because there is a danger of this becoming a race war."

"I look for a new surge of leadership from the business and economic community, which is not known for its reforming zeal. But when it comes to tearing down the house — as happened in the South — they become a constructive element.

On the other hand, Joseph L. Block, chairman and chief executive officer of the Inland Steel Company, Chicago, saw in big business only one of the many elements that should participate in giving leadership.

Mr. Block, an influential man in the social reform movement, said he believed the main leadership must be taken by the Government and the civil rights organizations while big business should contribute its skills to specific areas such as job training, job opportunity, housing and related areas.

Future of Coalition

Paul Anthony, director of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, an interracial, nonprofit agency devoted to the cause of equal opportunity, said that big business had "a tremendous self-interest" in providing leadership.

"In the last decade," Mr. Anthony said, "we have seen some of the most vigorous leadership come from business. Every business community in the South was shocked by the depression caused by the troubles in Little Rock."

There was a difference of opinion about whether the traditional coalition of civil rights organizations and liberals had survived the nationwide riots and if the civil rights organizations would continue as an effective force.

Mr. Fleming said he believed that there was no evidence visible as yet of a new coalition of forces to replace the old coalition of civil rights groups and liberals.

Prof. C. Vann Woodward, Sterling Professor of History at Yale University, said he believed the coalition had collapsed before this summer's riots.

Professor Woodward, a leading authority on the Compromise of 1876 and the long repression of the Negroes that followed the withdrawal of the Union forces of occupation from the Southern states in 1877, explained:

"The old coalition on which we depended for civil rights progress collapsed after the Civil Rights Bill was passed in 1965 and went to pieces in 1966. The movement was based on the fulfillment of old promises and when this came to pass the movement came to an end.

"It is difficult to answer about new leadership in the United States. I beleive the N.A.A.C.P. and the National Urban League still have enough credit to carry on. The impact of the extremists in Newark has been exaggerated."

Despite the probable unfavorable short-term reaction of white America, Professor Woodward believed that there was hope for the time when people have evaluated the impact of the upheaval on the social fabric of the country.

A more optimistic note was struck by Morris B. Abrams, president of the American Jewish Committee. Mr. Abram, a lawyer who has been active in public service and the civil rights movement, said that one of the most hopeful aspects in the situation was capacity of Americans to forget their anger quickly.

He cited a saying attributed to the late Gov. Alfred E. Smith to the effect that the United States was a "10-day country" —that is to say, that everything can be forgotten in 10 days.

Dr. King Planning Protests To 'Dislocate' Large Cities

MOVEMENT

Massive but Nonviolent Campaign Is Sought, Before Congress Adjourns, to Get Federal Aid for Negroes

8/16/67

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Aug. 15 — The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said today that he planned to "dislocate" Northern cities with massive but nonviolent demonstrations of civil disobedience before Congress adjourns its current session.

The civil rights leader told delegates to the annual convention of his Southern Christian Leadership Conference that he had decided on the step to provide an alternative to rioting and to gain large Federal spending programs for improverished Negroes.

"To dislocate the functioning of a city without destroying it can be more effective than a riot because it can be longer-lasting, costly to the society but not wantonly destructive," Dr. King said. "Moreover, it is more difficult for Government to quell it by superior force."

"Mass civil disobedience," he added, "can use rage as a constructive and creative force."

Dr. King announced also that he would meet with his staff in about two weeks to discuss the "specifics" of the civil disobedience campaign and to consider such tactics as weekly school boycotts, blocking plant gates with unemployed Negroes and disrupting governmental operations with sit-in demonstrations in Federal buildings.

The ultimate objective of any demonstration, Dr. King made clear, will be to draw Congress and President Johnson into responding to Negro demands for jobs, improved housing, better education and more intensive enforcement of existing civil rights legislation.

"Our real problem is that there is no disposition by the Administration nor Congress to seek fundamental remedies beyond police measures," he said. "The tragic truth is that Congress, more than the American people, is now running wild with racism."

The idea of massive civil disobedience in the North is not new with Dr. King, although he has never committed himself to it as firmly as he did today. A year ago, he briefly discussed jamming the freeways of Chicago and other Northern cities with Negro sit-in demonstrators, but abandoned the project after white mobs attacked his open-housing marches with rocks and bottles in Chicago.

Campaign Delayed

Some of his aides said then that in delaying his civil disobedience campaign, Dr. King was acting on the advice of people who felt that further demonstrations could touch off still more racial strife in the Chicago area.

Now, according to some of the same aides, he believes that Negroes will not stop rioting unless they are presented with alternative ways of militant protest.

"It is purposeless to tell Negroes they should not be enraged when they should be," Dr. King said today. "Indeed, they will be mentally healthier if they do not suppress rage but vent it constructively and use its energy peacefully but forcefully to cripple the operations of an oppressive society. Civil disobedience can utilize the militance wasted in riots to seize clothes or groceries many do not even want."

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. addresses meeting.

However, Dr. King is almost certain to encounter major difficulties in carrying out "massive" civil disobedience campaigns, particularly if he should decide to center the assault on Washington.

No Grass-Roots Staff

One problem is that he has no grass-roots organizing staff working in Negro neighborhoods in Washington, and might be forced to transport demonstrators to the city from other areas. This could seriously tax his organization's financial resources, which have dropped considerably since the Selma-to-Montgomery protest march in 1965.

His staff is also scattered—in Chicago, Cleveland and the South—and probably would have to be regrouped before any massive campaign could be undertaken.

But for all the problems, Dr. King clearly wants to create what he terms a "nonviolent confrontation" between Negroes and the Johnson Administration and Congress. He said that in voting down a rat control bill and cutting back on several poverty programs, Congress had shown itself to be "more anti-Negro than anti-rat."

He also criticized President Johnson—although not by name—for escalating the war in Vietnam, rather than diverting defense money to a war on slums. And he said that he saw little to be gained from the President's investigation into riots when, he said, it is obvious that the "root causes" of rioting are unemployment, under employment, poor housing and discrimination.

S.N.C.C. CRITICIZED FOR ISRAEL STAND

Rights Leaders Score Attack on Jews as 'Anti-Semitism'

NYT 8/16/67

By KATHLEEN TELTSCH

Civil rights leaders reacted with angry statements yesterday to the attack on Zionism and Israel made by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

These leaders, in protesting the attack, all used the term "anti-Semitism". They also called the committee an extremist group that did not speak for the American Negro.

The protests were directed at a bimonthly newsletter of the student group, which accused Israelis of committing atrocities against the Arabs, and also charged that there was bias in Israel against dark-skinned Jews.

Spokesmen for leading Jewish and Zionist organizations pointed to the sacrifices made by Jews in working for civil rights causes.

Some mentioned the slaying in 1964 of Michael Schwerner, a 23-year-old Brooklyn social worker and Andrew Goodman, a 20-year-old New York college student.

Both were killed while doing field work in Mississippi on programs supported by the committee. Mr. Schwerner and Mr. Goodman were Jews.

Representation Denied

Rights leaders tended to emphasize that the militant Negro organization was not representative of all American Negro opinion.

Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, said that the views in the Newsletter resembled those of the American Nazi party on Arab-Israel relations.

"Negro citizens are well aware of the contributions made to the drive for equal rights by Jewish citizens. Negroes have been the victims of racism for too long to indulge in group stereotypes and racial hate themselves," Mr. Young said.

Mr. Young also said that studies by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in big city ghettos had shown the Negro to be less anti-Semitic than other Americans.

Desperate for Attention

In a joint statement, A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, and Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, said they were "appalled and distressed by the anti-Semitic article." The two rights leaders said the statement reflected a "complete divorce from the opinions and aspirations of the mass of American Negroese."

Each time S.N.C.C. issues such statements, "the organization becomes less effective in the Negro community, grows smaller and becomes more desperate for attention," they declared.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., who was in Atlanta, declined to comment on S.N.C.C.'s position on the Arab-Israeli dispute because he had not read the newsletter. He said he was strongly opposed to anti-Semitism and "anything that does not signify my concern for humanity for the Jewish people."

Harry Belafonte, the singer, who has been a financial supporter of the committee, said through a spokesman in California that he knew nothing of the newsletter and was surprised at the reports of its contents. The spokesman said Mr. Belafonte had been a supporter of Israel and performed at fund-raising benefits.

A number of Jewish organizations, including labor and veterans' groups, joined those who criticized the newsletter on Monday.

Will Maslow, executive director of the American Jewish Congress said S.N.C.C. had "disqualified itself from any claim to be taken seriously in the struggle for human decency."

"There is no room for racists in the fight against racism," he said.

Rabbi Israel Miller, chairman of the American Zionist Council, called the views in the newsletter "crude and unadulterated anti-Semitism."

Malcolm A. Tarlov, national commander of the Jewish War Vetearns of the United States, deplored the statement as anti-Semitic, anti-Israel and pro-Communist and said the organization "no longer deserves either the financial or moral support of Americans, whatever their race or religion."

The Jewish Labor Committee charged that the student group, led by Stokey Carmichael and H. Rap Brown, has "now irrevocably joined the anti-Semitic American Nazi party and the Ku Klux Klan as an apostle of racism in the United States."

Bernard Katzen, vice chairman of the New York State Commission for Human Rights, called the charges "scurrilous" and said they represented a "desperation approach for sensationalism by a small discredited group," which was calculated to stir up domestic ethnic discord.

Dr. Martin Peretz, a director of the National Conference for New Politics, also attacked the statement as vicious anti- Semitism. The conference was set up 18 months ago as a coalition of peace and civil rights groups.

King Aide Seeks to Organize Negro Ministers in 15 Cities

MOVEMENT AC 1/22/68

By DIANE STEPP
Constitutional Religion Editor

An official of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference said Monday that he will organize Negro ministers in the Atlanta area and in 14 other major cities across the nation to "redefine the ministry of the Negro church and propose a role which is not so traditional."

The proposed role will include development of programs dealing with housing, job opportunities, education, police brutality and poverty programs.

The official, the Rev. T. Y. Rogers Jr., who was named director of a program to train Negro ministers in community leadership by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. last month, said invitations have been extended to selected Negro ministers in the Atlanta area for participation in the program.

"Some of those invited have been active in 'the movement' but many of them haven't," he explained.

Initially, only 10 ministers will participate in the program, but Dr. King has expressed hope that the program can be expanded to include additional Negro ministers and eventually be open to others who are interested.

The new project, funded by a grant from the Ford Foundation, will begin Feb. 19-24 with 150 ministers from 15 major cities attending an orientation workshop in Miami, Fla. Immediately following the program, ministers will meet in local workshops to develop leadership, planning and conduct of urban programs in such fields as employment, business development, housing and education.

"We will in fact be dealing with how to deal with recalcitrant police and bringing pressure on city governments to deal with problems in Atlanta housing urban renewal, the changing scene of the city. We will fortmulate programs and enlist support from the Negro community as well as other community organizations," said the Rev. Mr. Rogers.

The newly appointed program director said that ministers invited to participate have been chosen "across denominational lines" and involves "ministers of all sizes of churches."

"We hope to form a cohesive community," said the Rev. Mr. Rogers who, prior to his appointment to the SCLC staff, was a member of the organization's board of directors.

In the Urban Leadership Training Program, the Rev. Mr. Rogers will work in association with officers and staff members of SCLC.

Asked if any reluctance has been expressed toward the church becoming involved in these social issues, the director said, " I'm sure this will be discussed. There is a traditional role which the people expect, but we are proposing a role which is not so traditional. We are attempting to make the church more relevant. I see this as an expression of a witness of the church."

WILKINS CHASTISES NEGRO MILITANTS

NYT 3/18/68

Calls Them Obstructionists Who Work for Mischief

MOVEMENT

By EARL CALDWELL

Roy Wilkins, a target of much abuse from Negro militants, described his critics yesterday as a small minority that is "light on work unless that work is creating mischief and embarrassment for somebody."

Mr. Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, chastised the militants for their failure to help gain the passage of civil rights legislation.

Instead of builders, he pictured them as obstructionists: "They want to fight the white man if he does this" or they want to block him. They want to embarrass him or they want to make it impossible for him to attain some goal that he wants. But they don't turn that energy inward and talk about building themselves."

N.A.A.C.P. Is Defended

Mr. Wilkins voiced his criticism on the militants during an appearance on the WNBC-TV program "Speaking Freely." At the same time, he also defended the moderate approaches used by the N.A.A.C.P. in its efforts to solve racial problems.

In the past year, since he failed to embrace black power concepts, Mr. Wilkins has been subjected to heavy criticism from militant leaders.

A number of his critics have branded him as an "Uncle Tom" and called him a betrayer to his race.

Mr. Wilkins acknowledged that criticism and conceded that some of the militants had refused to talk to him.

Others, he said, use the words but "don't even know what they mean." He said that many of them were "youngsters who don't know much about their own race." He called it one of the great tragedies.

Ignorant of Own Race

Speaking of "Negro young people who know so little about their own race," he said.

"They don't even know what has happened before they came on the scene: what the conditions were, how wages were, what job opportunities there were, how people worked to get to school and get education, how they held a stable family, how they had to take low sometimes.

"Yes, they had to take low and how they kept on, kept

"Yes, they had to take low and how they kept on, kept pressing on and pressing on. They don't know anything about that and don't care about it."

Mr. Wilkins also defended his organization's use of the words "colored people" and "Negro."

Many militant groups now demand to be called black instead of Negro. They maintain that the word Negro is a term applied to black people in America in an effort to cut them off from their African heritage.

Of the words "colored people," Mr. Wilkins said that "it's a good term and it's accurate."

Your name is that by which you're known," he added. "It doesn't make any difference whether you call yourself black, Afro-American or Negro. You're still the same person."

Presence 'Significant'

Mr. Wilkins conceded that the presence of the black militants was "significant," but he guessed that there were only about 5,000 in the country. "That is, those of the real black conviction," he said.

However, he agreed that "there are a lot of people who are emotionally committed to that sort of thing in one degree or another."

"They don't go as far as the black nationalists," he said, "but they subscribe to better racial image, pride in blackness and reviving the history and ego of the Negro in this country, which has been submerged so cruelly for so long.

But Mr. Wilkins added that the large majority of Negroes that he knows or hears from, "like millions and millions of white people in this country, aspire to the middle-class status."

He pictured the N.A.A.C.P.'s role as helping Negroes progress towards the middle-class civilization.

In answer to those critics who accuse him of embracing gradualism, he said that "human progress has never been made in leaps and bounds."

Mr. Wilkins added that "if you can give the black militants any marks at all," it would be for what they have done to arouse the Negro and white populations from apathy.

He said that they had stopped whites from believing that the Negro question was safe and Negroes from believing that they could not do anything about it.

Williams' Case Was Handled In Capital, U.S. Attorney Says

U.S. District Attorney Charles Goodson said Friday that Washington officials took over complete control of a stolen car case involving Atlanta civil rights leader Hosea Williams.

Goodson said "the whole thing" was handled by the Justice department in Washington.

Asked if he knew of any past instances in which Washington sent down special attorneys to handle car theft cases, he said, "Not since I've been here."

He said he had been instructed by the Justice department to refer to Washington all calls concerning the case.

The Justice department refused to comment. Joseph Ponder, special agent in charge of the Atlanta FBI office, also would have nothing to say.

No charges have been brought against Williams.

Williams is an official of Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference and has led racial demonstrations throughout the South.

It is reported that Williams had been in possession of keys to two stolen rental cars. One was recovered in Morgan County, the other at the Atlanta Airport.

Last September, Morgan County Sheriff W. H. Knight stopped a carload of civil rights demonstrators on their way to racial demonstrations in Crawfordville. The car had been reported stolen. According to officers, the driver of the car said he had been assigned to the vehicle and given its keys by Williams.

Later, Atlanta police recovered a stolen car at the Municipal Airport. It was traced back to the Rev. Martin Luther King Sr. who told officers Williams had provided him with the car and had had the keys to it.

Georgia Lt. Gov. Peter Zack Geer charged that the Justice department's "handling of the Hosea Williams matter is demonstrative evidence of the fallacies, inconsistencies and glaring humbuggery of the so-called Great Society."

He charged that the department is fostering "disrespect for justice at the bar" by its handling of the Williams matter.—

HATTIESBURG, Miss., Jan. 15 — Vernon Dahmer's widow and son leave cemetery near Hattiesburg after funeral service for the NAACP civil rights leader who died on January 10th after nightriders fire-bombed his home. Dahmer's son, Vernon Jr., is a Master Sgt. in the U. S. Army. His three brothers are also members of the armed forces.

Mourning a martyr

The Washington Post

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1966

Crime Against Civilization

The slaying of Vernon Dahmer in Hattiesburg, Miss., has all the earmarks of an atrocity aimed at the suppression of civil rights. The 58-year-old Negro, a past president of the NAACP in the town, had announced a campaign to collect poll tax fees so that members of his race could qualify to vote. The response of Hattiesburg hoodlums was an attack on his home and his store, both of which were burned to the ground. Mr. Dahmer's injuries proved fatal; his wife and daughter were also injured.

The country must find ways of stopping this kind of terrorism. One method of dealing with it was demonstrated a few weeks ago at Bogalusa, La., where leaders of the Ku Klux Klan who had engaged in harassment and lawlessness were put under injunction. The Department of Justice ought to be prepared to move into every community where there is a systematic pattern of racial violence. In most instances, we surmise, these outrages may be laid directly at the door of the Klan, and there seems to be little hope for improvement until that conspiracy against law and order is restrained or destroyed.

But the problem cannot be safely left entirely to the Federal Government. It is time for decent citizens everywhere to express their indignation over the continued toll of violence and to demand action by their communities and local governments. The murder of people because they are seeking their rights is a crime against civilization and must be treated as such.

NIGHTRIDERS KILL MISSISSIPPI NEGRO

Fire-bomb Attack Destroys Both Home and Grocery

SCENE OF FATAL BOMBING IN MISSISSIPPI: Ruins of house and grocery store of Vernon Dahmer, civil rights leader, smolder in Hattiesburg after being destroyed in the night by firebombs. Mr. Dahmer later died of injuries suffered in the fire.

HATTIESBURG, Miss., Jan. 10 (UPI) — Vernon Dahmer, a 58-year-old Negro civil rights leader, died late today of burns suffered when nightriders unleashed a pre-dawn firebomb attack on his home and his grocery store.

Mr. Dahmer, who had announced on a local radio station yesterday that he would collect poll taxes and pay them for Negro voters, died about 5 P.M. Eastern standard time.

His wife and daughter were hospitalized with burns, but two sons and Mr. Dahmer's elderly aunt, who ran the small grocery store for him, escaped injury.

In Washington, Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach issued a statement praising Mr. Dahmer as a man "engaged in the highest kind of citizenship —helping to secure basic rights for his fellow citizens."

Johnson Voices Concern

Mr. Katzenbach said President Johnson "has expressed to me his deep concern over the tragedy." Mr. Johnson wanted the full resources of the Justice Department made available until the persons responsible for Mr. Dahmer's death were caught, Mr. Katzenbach said.

Critically burned, Mr. Dahmer staggered out of his flaming home early today and loosed a shotgun blast at the nightriders' fleeing car.

A shot-battered car, believed to be the one used by the nightriders, was found three miles away in adjacent Jones County, headquarters of the secret White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan.

The owner of the car, an Ellisville man, reported to the police this morning that the car had been stolen last night. Two tires were blown out by the shotgun blast and the rear was dented by the pellets.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has accused the White Knights of plotting and carrying out much of Mississippi's racial violence. A number of alleged officials and members of the group from Jones County were under subpoena to appear before the House Committee on Un-American Activities in Washington this week.

It was the White Knights, the FBI asserted, who plotted the killing of three young civil rights workers in Philadelphia, Miss., in 1964.

Hattiesburg's Mayor Paul Grady, and Selby C. Bowling, president of the County Board of Supervisors, issued a joint statement denouncing the "tragic and deplorable" event and calling for both whites and Negroes to join efforts against lawlessness.

The statement pledged city and county support to law enforcement agencies "that not only those now responsible shall be brought to justice but that further events of this nature shall not again occur."

Mr. Dahmer, former president of the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, appeared on a Hattiesburg radio station yesterday and announced he would begin collecting the poll tax — a $2 fee required for voting in state and local elections—from the Negro community and would take the money to the Sheriff's office.

More than 300 angry Negroes marched on the courthouse tonight demanding action over the death.

Charles Evers, state field director for the N.A.A.C.P., led the march and urged an economic boycott of the city. It was the same tactic used at Natchez, Miss., last summer after a local civil rights leader was injured in a bombing.

"The only thing the white man understands is the ballot and the dollar," Mr. Evers shouted. "We're going to get both of them."

Authorities said at least four "Molotov cocktails" — bottles filled with kerosene and stuffed with a wick — were thrown into Mr. Dahmer's two-story house and adjacent store about 2:30 A.M.

The dying man told the police he first believed a tear gas bomb was tossed inside the house first.

Mrs. Luranie Heidelberg, 84, Mr. Dahmer's aunt, said she was asleep in her room at the back of the store when the attack occurred.

"I got up and lay down on the floor," she said. "I heard glass shatter, then the place blazed up."

The house was aroused, but Mr. Dahmer, his wife, Ellie, 41, and daughter, Betty, 10, were burned. Two sons escaped injury.

The house was leveled, except for the two-story chimney. The store was destroyed as well as the family's automobile.

A pick-up truck owned by Mr. Dahmer, parked away from the house, was fired into several times, smashing windows, and an unexploded "Molotov cocktail" was found in the rear of the truck.

Negro's Views Voiced

HATTIESBURG, Miss., Jan. 10 (AP)—Earlier in the day, Mr. Dahmer, talking to a newsman from his hospital bed after the attack, said:

"I've been active in trying to get people to register to vote. People who don't vote are deadbeats on the state. I figure a man needs to do his own thinking.

"What happened to us last night can happen to anybody, white or black. At one time I didn't think so, but I have changed my mind."

Mr. Dahmer said he was awakened by gunshots about 2:30 A.M. He said he had grabbed a shotgun and fired several blasts at a rapidly disappearing car before fleeing with his family from the house.

State and Federal officials quickly joined Forrest County authorities in an investigation of the attack.

This was the second attack on a Mississippi N.A.A.C.P. leader in recent months. George Metcalf, president of the Natchez N.A.A.C.P. Chapter, was injured seriously last September when his car was booby-trapped.

U.S. Intervention Asked

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the N.A.A.C.P., asked the Federal Government last night to "move with all its powers" to find the persons who attacked Vernon Dahmer and his family in Hattiesburg, Miss., Sunday night.

"This is precisely the kind of outrage which has produced the demand for new Federal legislation to correct flagrant abuses in the administration of justice in so-called racial cases," Mr. Wilkins said in a telegram to Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach.

Mr. Wilkins said the case "seems to fall clearly under the prohibition of the new law designed to restrain those who would interfere with the right to register and vote."

Authorities said at least four "Molotov cocktails" were thrown into Mr. Dahmer's home and the store.

The victim was a past president of the local Chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. An announcement had Sunday that Mr. Dahmer would collect poll tax fees from Negroes for payment to the state in an effort to boost Negro voter registration.

Charles Evers, Mississippi NAACP chief, said, "That was the reason for the attack."

In Washington, Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach said in a statement that President Johnson had expressed to him "his deep concern over the grievous tragedy." Mr. Katzenbach said he advised the President the FBI has an intensive investi-

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, JANUARY 16, 1966.

Wilkins: What's Ahead on Rights

There have been stories in recent months that the civil-rights movement—many of its goals now fulfilled through Federal legislation and many of its activities preempted by the Federal Government—is in a period of crisis. The movement is said to be beset by factionalism and, while aware that change is necessary, uncertain about how and where to change. What follows is an interview by Martin Tolchin of The New York Times staff with Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, on these problems.

Q. Is the civil rights movement in trouble?

WILKINS: I don't think it's in any greater trouble than it has been all along. It has alway had financial trouble and it's always had difficulty mobilizing an effective assault upon this or that segment of the problem.

Q. Yet you've noted that membership has fallen.

WILKINS: We think that a lot of people, seeing that civil rights laws have been passed, probably feel that the battle is over, or at least there's nothing left but to mop up and they'll let somebody else do that.

Q. Is the battle over?

WILKINS: No. As one of my colleagues has said, this is a more sophisticated era of civil rights. People can always be rallied to support, or renew their support, or enlarge their support when the battle involves personal persecution, like the case in Mississippi where a man's home was burned down, his grocery store burned down, his family sent to the hospital with burns and he himself died. The Negro public can transfer to that. But you say to them, "We want to study the curriculum of six junior high schools in Worcester, Mass." They say, "Oh." It's not dramatic.

Q. Well, are you satisfied with with the Federal efforts in civil rights?

WILKINS: Oh, we aren't, of course. Our present complaint with the Federal establishment is that we do not believe it has recruited an adequate staff for enforcement. And we also believe that the administration of non-discrimination in employment will require much more effort than the Government thus far is putting forward. The things that it did in 1950 simply won't go now.

Political Role

Q. Does the N.A.A.C.P. expect to get into politics?

WILKINS: If you mean by that are we going to sponsor candidates, endorse candidates, run candidates, the answer is no. We always say that we are a political organization, but we're non-partisan. We believe that the political weapon—the weapon of political influence can be used much more astutely and much more effectively by the Negro voter in the North and in the border states and now in the South. If he will study the ways of politics and eschew somewhat the ways of emotional fervor, the Negro voter can get results.

Q. With its middle class orientation, is the N.A.A.C.P. getting into the ghetto?

WILKINS: We do operate in the ghetto—we have chapters in 1,600 cities in all 50 states—but not as much as we would like to or as deeply as we intend to. We consider that we have tackled ghetto problems—housing, slumlords, bad schools, garbage removal, streets and lighting and sanitation and organizing tenant councils. It always amuses me to hear people talking about the N.A.A.C.P. being so legalistic and so respectable that it doesn't know anything about picketing and boycotts.

Well, we're the granddaddy of that sort of thing. We've forgotten more about it than these youngsters who walk around here carrying signs and chanting songs are likely ever to know. We ran picket lines back in 1915 when "Birth of a Nation" was first released by Hollywood. Picket lines are old stuff to us.

Q. What about this conflict with other civil rights groups?

WILKINS: Well, there is no conflict on basic programs—none whatsoever. I'm disturbed by the careless use of the term "civil rights movement" because this is an umbrella that takes in everybody. It takes in local groups that are headed by people you never heard of until last week. But it also takes in very small groups like Snick (Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee) which, I think, would not claim more than 200 so-called members or staff members in the United States, but which is very singular and devoted and dedicated in its purposes. It takes in Martin Luther King's organization, which is a group of affiliates, largely clerical, and behind that a loyal army of people who believe in Dr. King personally as a symbol, but do not constitute an organized body. It takes in CORE (Congress on Racial Equality), which is a very active group, but medium in size.

It takes in the Urban League, which is a specialized professional social work organization of highly-trained people in a limited number of cities—70 or 75 at the most—embarked on a program that envisages partnership and understanding and education and mutual help. And it takes in the N.A.A.C.P., which runs the spectrum. It takes in, for example, our friend Dick Gregory, who is a one-man army by himself, you know. He's part of the civil rights movement.

Q. What's ahead for N.A.A.C.P.?

WILKINS: Well, when I hear people talking about the civil rights movement changing and what are you going to do now, as far as we're concerned, we're going to intensify the same programs we have had, maybe with some modern touches and embellishments. But the basic problems of the American Negro remain unemployment due to racial discrimination; inferior and unequal education; lack of access to the ballot box, expecially in the South; slums and housing in the North; high prices and high interest rates and exploitation by local merchants and money lenders. These are the things we're going to tackle and we're going to continue to tackle.

Issues and Slogans

Now we have a better climate—a climate that we have helped to create. In fact, we think we have done more to create it than anyone else. I'm not throwing off on the other organizations, because they brought the very valuable involvement of great masses of people and they simplified the issues and made the people in the street understand them. They made them into slogans and they got people to work. I hail them. I welcome them. I think it has been a wonderful thing. But it has carried the seeds of its own delusions. People are buoyed up by slogans. But if people believe and if something doesn't happen next Thursday morning at 11 o'clock, then the whole movement is thought to be a failure.

Our big problem is a chronic one with all civil rights organizations—we need more money to carry out a good many of the plans that are here on paper and ready to be carried out. There are major problems, as I said, in northern urban centers. We think if they're not solved, if somebody doesn't do something about them, that we're going to have explosions in our cities that are going to be pretty terrible. I wish we had the money to do it.

I wish also we had the money to carry out the kind of registration campaign in the South that needs to be carried on. I don't mean the kind that picks a fight with the sheriff and gets somebody's head beaten and somebody thrown in jail and then you march down to the mayor's office in a protest demonstration. This is not registering voters. Registering voters requires year-round, day-to-day, neighborhood - to - neighborhood campaigns.

But the basic tactics will remain as they always have been. And I want to emphasize that the basic tactic for the N.A.A.C.P. has been flexible, has been fluid.

Murder Unpunished

The name of the Rev. James J. Reeb can now be added to a sad, strange honor roll. Other names on that roll read: Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner, James Chaney, Mrs. Viola Liuzzo, Medgar Evers, Jimmy Lee Jackson and Jonathan Daniels. Negro and white, cleric and layman, man and woman, they share the common fate that they died in the South for their civil rights convictions—and that their murders go unpunished.

The trial of the three men accused of Mr. Reeb's murder that ended the other day in an acquittal in Selma, Ala., was not an isolated event. It featured testimony by two eyewitnesses positively identifying one of the defendants as the leader of the gang that attacked the dead man. But their words carried no weight with a local jury apparently determined not to convict. Two months ago another jury in Hayneville, Ala., ignored equally compelling evidence in the murder of Jonathan Daniels, a New Hampshire seminarian.

Such verdicts have to be "expected from time to time. They are the price you have to pay for the jury system." That was the comment of Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach after the Hayneville fiasco. It seemed an inadequate response to the problem then; it is even more defective now.

The need is clear—as we have noted here before—for a law making it a Federal crime to commit an act of violence or to threaten violence with racial purpose or effect against any person. The United States Commission on Civil Rights recommended such a law last month; bills to this effect have been introduced in Congress by members of both parties but have not been acted upon because of Justice Department opposition.

One reason for that opposition is the reluctance of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to become, in effect, a local police agency trying to solve local murders. The F.B.I.'s concern is understandable but exaggerated. The violence in the South is not likely to persist. It is the last spasm of a dying social order founded upon racial inequality and intimidation. If the Federal Government makes it plain that it will not permit violence to go unpunished, these murders will dwindle, for the men who commit them are as cowardly as they are despicable.

The fact that the three men who were accused of the murder of Mrs. Liuzzo and acquitted in a state court were subsequently convicted in a Federal court of conspiracy to deprive the dead woman of her civil rights is not a sufficient answer to the problem. A conspiracy statute is an awkward device with which to prosecute a capital offense, and the penalties possible under it are incommensurate with the gravity of the crime. A Federal law facing up to the full range and seriousness of these crimes is necessary. Murder can no longer go unpunished.

Eleanor Roosevelt Interns Attend Mid-Term Seminar

NAIRO's third class of Eleanor Roosevelt Interns met at their mid-term seminar at Krisheim, conference center of the United Presbyterian Church—USA, near Philadelphia. March 6-8. Staff leaders of the seminar were Joe Allen, NAIRO Career Service Board Chairman; John Feild, CSB Vice Chairman; Nate Greene and Fred Routh. The Interns discussed case studies, which they had prepared in advance of the seminar. The staff was impressed with the high calibre of these case studies and with the high level of professional discussion which followed their presentation before the four discussion groups.

The Interns also heard four professionals discuss various aspects of the intergroup relations field. James Gibson, Poverty Specialist with the Potomac Institute, discussed local, neighborhood OEO centers; Walter Lewis, U.S. Commission on Civil Rights' Federal Programs Division Director, discussed federal programs affecting civil rights; William Meek, Director of the Wharton Center, spoke on the role of Settlement Houses in the civil rights struggle; and Richard Taylor, Executive Director of the Fair Housing Council of Delaware Valley, presented a case study in community tension, dealing with housing integration in Folcroft, Pennsylvania. In each case, speakers complimented the Interns for asking the hard questions and for showing an unusual grasp of the field.

U. S. Senate and House Told NAIRO Opposes CRS Transfer

NAIRO Executive Director, Fred Routh, appeared before the Sub-Committee on Executive Reorganization of the U.S. Senate Committee on Government Operations on March 3rd. Routh was invited by Senator Abraham Ribicoff, Sub-Committee Chairman, at the request of Senator Jacob Javits to present testimony based on NAIRO's Resolution protesting the transfer of the Community Relations Service to the Justice Department. NAIRO President, John Hope regarded this as a further step in carrying out the mandate of the membership to make known NAIRO's position on this important matter. Routh also appeared before the hearings held by the counterpart in the House of Representatives.

Routh explained to the two Committees NAIRO's role as a professional association then, after reading the Resolution into the record, he said in part:

"The discussion which took place before the final adoption of this resolution unfolded the rationale behind the concern expressed in it. It was felt that the assignment of the community relations service to the Justice Department would create unneccessary problems. It was the professional opinion of those who spoke that among the problems such a move would create are:

"(a) A confusion of role. The Community Relations Service has assumed the role not only of assisting in the desegregation of public accommodations and public facilities, but also the even more crucial role of assisting communities, through persuasion and conciliation to provide equality of opportunity and treatment for all their citizens. Their representatives have also been useful in crisis situations and, on the basis of their efforts of last summer, in preventing crisis situations. The important phrase in what I have just said, is 'through persuasion and conciliation.'

"The Justice Department is the legal branch, the enforcement agency, the prosecutor. These are undertakings that it performs well, but they are undertakings different from persuasion and conciliation. Certainly, in the past, members of the Justice Department have been effective at conciliatory and persuasive efforts. We are indebted to Burke Marshall, former Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, to John Doar, currently the Assistant Attorney General for

1966 CONFERENCE, NOVEMBER 15-18, LOS ANGELES

BEYOND DESEGREGATION

The question of next steps after school desegregation is of increasing concern to educators and to intergroup relations professionals. Most recognize that desegregation is not enough; that integregation is a must on democracy's agenda. The Community Relations Conference of Southern California has adopted an Educational Policy Statement which shows advanced thinking on this matter. NAIRO members might find it useful to share this policy statement in their respective communities.

Educational Policy Statement—Community Relations Conference of Southern California

The Community Relations Conference of Southern California believes that education is a basic human right and an important instrument of individual and social change.

We believe that the goals of education apply equally to all human beings. We believe, however, that many of these goals often are neglected and that among these neglected goals are:

Helping every person realize his full potential and develop into the best that is he capable of becoming;

Recognizing persons as unique individuals characterized by individual and cultural differences with a variety of needs and interests;

Developing in each person the ability to perceive accurately the world in which he lives; and Creating an environment for sensitive, human relationships among people of various races, religions, backgrounds, and social classes.

We believe that these goals cannot be pursued fully in segregated schools, even de facto segregated schools. This is equally applicable for students in all-majority group schools and all-minority group schools. Both groups are, in a very vital sense, disadvantaged. While the definition of "racial balance" must be based on different problems in different situations, we believe that a positive commitment to quality, integrated education—as opposed to desegregation—must be clearly defined by every school district. Such integration should not mean physical proximity alone, although that is necessary, but rather a continually growing condition of mutual esteem and social interaction. Integrated teaching staffs, of course, are essential to this entire process.

As these goals are achieved and as integration takes place, there will continue to be large numbers of students who are educationally disadvantaged because of prior experience, cultural differences, factors of class and caste, and or discrimination. We believe, therefore, that throughout every school district programs of integration must be accompanied by massive programs of "differential education" or what has been known as compensatory education. (We do not believe that integration and differential education within individual schools or individual classes are mutually exclusive or even can take place effectively one without the other.) These programs of differential education must use all possible resources, funds, agencies and techniques to overcome blocks to learning and encourage aspiration and motivation. This should not be limited to curriculum offerings and sensitive, individualized teaching and counseling, but should include physical facilities and equipment (libraries, cafeterias, etc.) There must be no "superior" and "inferior" schools.

We believe that public schools have the obligation to lead students toward ways of thinking and feeling about people that will make it natural for each to regard the other as an individual, to be evaluated as an individual without regard to racial or other characteristics irrelevant to his individual worth. To this end the public schools must pursue programs of instruction and attitude formation that will lead students to accept their differences and to develop emotionally secure attitudes toward themselves and their fellows. Most important to the successful pursuit of such a program of intergroup education is the maintenance of democratic relationships within the school among pupils, teachers and administrators. Essential to it is an emphasis, pervading the atmosphere of the school, expressed in curriculum and classroom, and reflected in the genuine commitment of the entire system and its personnel.

Teacher training, both pre-service and in-service, designed to develop and intensify sensitivity and skills in dealing with individual and group differences in the classroom is therefore vital to the quality, integrated education that we seek. This means, primarily, developing in all teachers the ability to see and respond to human beings as human beings, deal constructively with prejudices in themselves and their students, and erase the myths and stereotypes of racial and religious superiority or inferiority that lead to fears and tensions in the classroom and the community. This means attention not only to specific preparation of the teacher, but also to the need for accurate and adequate teaching materials particularly designed to strengthen the concept of self of all students and present to all students the too-frequently overlooked contributions of minority groups to the American heritage and mankind generally.

We believe that these goals and the educational programs necessary to achieve them not only will benefit all members of our society but also are the responsibility of all members of our society. We believe, therefore, that there is an urgent need for broad community understanding and support in order to bring about the gigantic and costly coordinated effort by all agencies of the community that will be required to make this vision a reality. We believe, however, that no effort and expense can be deemed too great to assure the future of our greatest resource—The American people. We believe, further, that educators must take primary responsibility for leadership in this endeavor, not only within the schools but also in the development of a school-community partnership to overcome the conditions that presently represent obstacles to such an educational achievement.

We realize, of course, that there are many informal educational problems that are beyond the scope of this statement and whose solution is the responsibility of the total community and the educator as citizen.

Finally, while we believe that educators must thus commit themselves to the achievement of quality, integrated education, we also pledge that the Community Relations Conference of Southern California, through its Education Committee and individual members, will devote the fullest measure of its resources and energies to:

Interpretation of the need for quality, integrated education;
Continued advocacy and support of efforts to achieve quality, integrated education; and finally,
Serve as a catalyst and the conscience of the community in seeking to make this kind of education a basic human right.

ANNA HOLDEN FILES CLAIM Miss Anna Holden, recently discharged employee of the Equal Opportunities Program of the U.S. Office of Education, has filed a claim with NAIRO's Grievance Committee, alleging unfair personnel practices. Chairman of the Committee is Walter Green; heading the investigating committee is John Feild who promised a prompt, thorough, and objective investigation. Procedures call for the investigating committee, upon completion of its investigation, to report to the Grievance Committee which, in turn, reports to NAIRO's Board with recommendations for disposition; final determination is in the hands of the Board. Quite a number of NAIRO members have written the national office asking about this particular situation. When the Board has made its final determination, all members will be notified of it. Miss Holden filed her complaint on March 17.

PRESIDENT'S CORNER

In the last issue of the NAIRO Newsletter, in the President's Corner, I raised five questions which might help clarify the similarities and differences between the roles of the intergroup relations practitioner, the civil rights worker, and those engated in the War on Poverty. I suggested that these questions might be examined at Chapter meetings. I would like to take the concept behind that suggestion a little further.

NAIRO Chapters can perform a very important service to our members and to other staff members, particularly those who only recently have come to our field. A number of our members have expressed some alarm at the lack of background in intergroup relations and civil rights evidenced among some new staff members with various governmental agencies. We should keep in mind that these are persons who voluntarily chose to come to this field and they they need help in understanding the principles, techniques, and nuances which are old-hat to many of us. There is a great reservoir of knowledge in each NAIRO Chapter which might be tapped by newcomers to our field.

We in NAIRO have often said that the difference between a NAIRO Chapter and a local coalition of agencies is in the professional focus on issues—including theory—found in the Chapter. Fred Routh has often said the most important purpose of NAIRO, itself, is to raise the perception and practice of those in the field. Chapters can contribute significantly to this, in a way that national NAIRO cannot. The Chapters are where the people are—members and non-members who have recently entered our field.

Lloyd Davis' Committee on Chapter Development is working manfully to give the Chapters an increasing role in the Association and an increased usefulness to the field. Art Levin's Committee on Program Development is contributing substantive ideas for improving program at both the national and Chapter levels. It is not enough that their good work reach only our members; it must also reach those who only recently have come to our field and many of whom have not yet joined NAIRO.

Chapters could—indeed, should provide opportunities for raising perception and practice among newcomers, NAIRO members and non-members alike. This would suggest a series of special meetings which would constitute an informal course in intergroup relations. Individual sessions should cover a number of substantive areas—perhaps, one area of study per session: employment, education, housing, police-community relations, etc. However, before getting into substantive questions it would seem wise to start with a session on some of the over-all issues in our field. I would suggest that we should start with a look at some of the advanced thinking in our field. I have always been impressed with the special issue of the JOURNAL OF INTERGROUP RELATIONS entitled, "Goals, Directions and Priorities in Intergroup Relations in the Decade Ahead." issued in the Spring of 1960. We will make this available, as a discussion guide, to newcomers who participate in the courses you set up for one dollar (rather than the regular price of $1.75).

You who serve as Chapter Chairmen, may expect to hear from Art Levin's Committee, suggesting a format for a series of meetings aimed at meeting the needs of newcomers to our field. Lloyd Davis' Committee will also be in touch with you regarding the involvement of newcomers in such a series and how, hopefully, this

DIRECTOR'S BOX

During the last few days of January and the early part of February, I made a swing about the country to visit selected Chapters and also certain cities in which NAIRO members had indicated an interest in developing NAIRO Chapters. The trip again demonstrated the desirability of having the Director and/or the President visit Chapters for there is no substitute for face-to-face exchanges of information, ideas, problems, and gripes. Personally, it also provided an opportunity to renew old friendships and to make new ones.

During the trip, I visited with leaders and members in the following Chapters: Mid-Central, in Kansas City; Northern California, in San Francisco; and Southern California, in Los Angeles. Cities in which NAIRO members had shown an interest in developing a Chapter, which I visited were: Dallas, Denver, Indianapolis, Phoenix, and Seattle. NAIRO is indebted to the many loyal members who came to these meetings and, even more, to those who called them; especially Maceo Smith and Gus Falk in Dallas, Helen Peterson and Sheldon Steinhauser in Denver, Grif Crump and Harold Hatcher in Indianapolis, Henry Cabirac in Phoenix, and Phil Hyasaka and Al Cowles in Seattle.

During my stay in Los Angeles, I met with the 1966 Annual Conference Planning Committee and found they are moving along nicely in developing a meaningful, professional program outline. Committee Chairman John Lyons indicated that a progress report would be ready for the April NAIRO Board Meeting. In San Francisco, Ed Howden had called the faithful together and the thirty-five, or so, present agreed to reorganize the Chapter and see that it met on a more regular basis. In Kansas City, Todd Pavela held an informal Chapter meeting and arranged for me to speak to the Mayors and Commission Board Members of both Kansas Cities in a joint-session.

During the period since I have been back, results have begun to flow in. Grif Crump, Executive Director of the Indianapolis Commission on Human Rights, has sent in a petition for Chapter status, complete with By-Laws, Officers, and a list of Charter Chapter Members. Bob Greenwald has written, indicating that Dallas is moving ahead to form a Chapter. Henry Cabirac has done the same for Phoenix, as has Phil Hyasaka for Seattle. Denver has indicated that it may "act as a Chapter for six months" before petitioning for full Chapter status. Bill Gremley informs us that the Northern California Chapter is off and running again. In other words, NAIRO is on the move. We should have between twenty-two and twenty-five Chapters by the end of this year.

During my four years as Director, I have never before seen such a high degree of interest and activity in NAIRO. And you must feel that this issue of the Director's Box is en-during, if not endearing.

Poems From Black Africa Edited by Langston Hughes. "The first major collection of its kind, represents 38 African poets from 11 countries, ranging in attitude and poetic form from personal lyricism to nationalistic protest, from the Petrarchan sonnet to . . . modern verse . . . will stimulate in readers new feelings about an increasingly vital continent...This collection, through the sure intimacy peculiar to poetry, adds modernity, delicacy, and beauty to our shifting image of Africa."—James A. Emanuel, The New York Times Book Review.

"An overdue contribution (beyond many current histories and reports) to our awareness of the complex truth presented in Nicol's 'The Meaning of Africa': 'You are not a Country, Africa, You are a Concept...'" —Ray Smith, Library Journal, 158 pages, $4.95.

The New World Negro: Selected Papers in Afroamerican Studies By Melville J. Herskovits• Edited by Frances S. Herskovits. Bringing together for the first time selected articles by the distinguished anthropologist, this volume presents a comprehensive survey of Herskovit's exhaustive study of the Negro in the Western Hemisphere. The author came to perceive the Afro-american field as a laboratory in which hypotheses of the widest scope in the study of acculturation could be tested, with ethnohistory as the control factor. Moreover, he regarded acculturation as a process of mutual exchange rather than a matter of members of minority groups taking over the cultural elements of a dominant majority. Herskovits also insisted that the study of a culture be holistic, and that the arts and values of a people be given full weight.

The volume is divided into eight major sections entitled The Afroamerican Field—A Laboratory for the Study of Man; Theory and Method; Ethnohistory—The Laboratory Control in Studies of Acculturation; Ethnopsychology; The Arts; Cult Life in Brazil; The World View of an Urban Community—Paramaribo, Dutch Guiana; and Reinterpretations. 480 pages, $10.00.

Three Years in Mississippi By James Meredith. This is James Meredith's own account of his experiences as the first Negro to enter the University of Mississippi. It contains not only the details of his fight to enroll and of the years he spent at "Ole Miss" but also his personal assessment of the racial struggle in the South, and his proposals for the future course of the civil rights movement, which often differ markedly from those advocated by Martin Luther King and other Negro leaders. 384 pages, $5.95.

BOOK FOR CHILDREN For those who have young children, for those who teach them, or for those who love them, there is a splendid new book on the market. Published by Piper Books and written by Sheldon N. Ripley, it is entitled: Matthew Henson—Arctic Hero. It is the story, told for ten to twelve year-olds, of the Co-Discoverer of the North Pole with Admiral Perry. The author in a closing note writes, "In trying to write about Matt Henson, I have tried to pick out the events in and around his boyhood that shaped his life and led him to become the man he was. For example, there were the people he met who saw only the color of his skin. They filled him with determination to prove that a Negro deserved the same rights as any man....But is was his meeting with Perry that was the turning point in his life...They found in each other the qualities they admired most—courage, loyalty, and determination." 188 pages.

PROJECT EQUALITY EXPANDS STAFF The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice recently announced the expansion of its staff to service the rapidly growing PROJECT EQUALITY equal employment opportunity program. Curtis Heaston of Chicago has joined the National interracial agency as Associate Director of the Department of Employment Sercices and Assistant National Program Director of Project Equality.

Conference executive director Mathew Ahmann stated that the appointment was required by the growing number of requests for the PROJECT EQUALITY program by Roman Catholic, Protestant, Orthodox and Jewish jurisdictions in all parts of the United States. PROJECT EQUALITY is a program using an educative approach by engaging the economic resources of religious institutions to overcome discrimination in employment practices.

The program was initiated in the Roman Catholic Archdioceses of St. Louis and Detroit in May 1965 and is now also operating in the Roman Catholic Archdioceses of San Antonio and Hartford, the Episcopal Diocese of Michigan, the Presbytery of Detroit, the Methodist Church of Detroit, the Eastern Orthodox Churches of Detroit, and Metropolitan Detroit Council of Churches.

According to Mr. Ahmann, the program should be established in about forty different religious jurisdictions by 1968. "Over 6,000 business firms have announced participation in PROJECT EQUALITY to date," Mr. Ahmann said, "and the list is growing by about 500 companies per month."

may lead to increased membership. What I hope to do now is to introduce this thinking to you—not to Chapter Chairmen, alone, but to the general membership; it is my firm conviction that such activities will enable NAIRO to assume the proper role, even more fully of the professional association in the field of intergroup relations. It is my belief that this will contribute to the maturation of our field and that it will bring it closer to being a profession, with all the ramifications involved.

ADL RESEARCH ANNUAL ON INTERGROUP RELATIONS '65 The Anti Defamation League of B'nai B'rith has again issued the valuable Research Annual on Intergroup Relations. It is edited by Melvin M. Tumin, Professor of Sociology at Princeton University. It is available at $1.95 in soft cover and $6.00 in hard cover from your local ADL office or from ADL, 315 Lexington Ave. New York, N.Y. 10016.

"Continuing an annual enterprise begun in 1958, this bulletin is designed to provide digests of research in the field of intergroup relations for the period September, 1964, to April, 1965...The information on which the digests are based was secured from responses to questionnaires sent out to persons identified as possibly active in the field of intergroup relations."

Encompassing completed, continuing, and contemplated projects, Professor Tumin provides an authoritative, cross referenced guide to current investigations of prejudice and social and behavioral problems among ethnic, racial, religious, and national groups. Reports are categorized according to principal focus of interest and listed alphabetically by author. The RESEARCH ANNUAL makes readily available the latest findings about patterns of discrimination in northern cities—in housing, education, and job opportunities—the attitude of the "radical right" toward Negroes and Jews, the reactions of Negroes to Puerto Ricans, of Mexicans to American Indians, of Hindus to Moslems, and of Protestants, Catholics, and Jews to each other. Other studies explore the problems of interracial marriage, the responses to the civil rights movement, the new approaches to crime and delinquency, and the development of attitudes both within minority groups and within the larger community.

A NOTE OF APOLOGY In the last issue of the NAIRO Newsletter it was announced that flyers were being enclosed from the Encampment For Citizenship and from the magazine Community. These had been sent to the NAIRO office for distribution to our members. We dutifully stuffed them in with the Newsletter and hauled them to the Post Office. Two days later a call from the Post Office indicated that our mailing permit did not include the right to circulate solicitations bearing postal permits from other cities as these did. Sorry we couldn't send you these materials. The two groups in question will be in touch with you themselves.

Civil Rights and to others who have performed this role, but these have been occasional affairs and have not constituted the main activities of the Justice Department.

"(b) A confusion of image. What people believe is often as important and often more important than what is. If, as I have indicated, there would be role confusion by assigning the Community Relations Service to the Justice Department, it was the professional opinion of those at the conference who discussed this resolution that there would be even more serious confusion regarding the image of the Community Relations Service as a part of the Justice Department. Out in the communities of the nation, the Justice Department is thought of as a combination of the FBI, the Federal District Attorney and Justice Department Attorneys enforcing the laws; the image of the Community Relations Service is that of an agency offering to assist, through professional services, communities in difficult situations or facing hard decisions. The image of the Community Relations Service attached to the Justice Department might best be described by a combination of the thinking of the Prophet Micah and Teddy Roosevelt: 'What is asked of the Community Relations Service but that it love mercy, do justly, walk humbly with its God and carry a big stick."

Routh summarized his experience as Executive Director of the Michigan FEPC and their practice of keeping distinct the roles of professionals as investigators and as staff directors of local Employment Advisory Committees in any one community. He explained that Field Representatives who served a local Employment Advisory Committee in a secretariat capacity did not investigate claims in the same community.

Routh also pointed out that a concern with the function of a Community Relations Service was not new with NAIRO. He read into the record the section of Executive Responsibility in Intergroup Relations entitled "Community Consultative Services in Intergroup Relations." This was the report presented to President Kennedy in 1961.

In conclusion, Routh said,

"One last word, Mr. Chairman: there are today in thirty-two of our States governmental intergroup relations agencies; only one is located in the Attorney-General's Office; there are today in some one hundred and seventy of our cities governmental intergroup relations agencies; not one is located in the Office of the City Attorney. Experience would seem to suggest that what has been organizationally valid for the States and the cities is also valid for the Federal Government. Mr. Chairman, the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials stands opposed to the transfer of the Community Relations Service to the Department of Justice."

Congress Gets The Civil Rights Protection Act of 1966

A bipartisan group of 20 Senators headed by Paul Douglas (D., Ill.) and Clifford Case (R., N.J.), on Thursday, February 10, introduced the bill under the title, "The Civil Rights Protection Act of 1966" (S.2923).

The bill is a response to the violence at Selma and Birmingham, the street corner and highway killings of men and women peacefully asserting their constitutional rights, and the kind of outrageous justice that has resulted in the acquittal of practically self-confessed murders.

What the Douglas-Case Bill Contains

Its six titles provide for: non-discriminatory selection of juries in federal and state courts; removal of state crimes to federal courts in order to assure equal protection of the law; injunctions against police and private violence; removal to federal courts of cases brought against Negroes and civil rights workers with the clear purpose of harassing them and subjecting them to discriminatory and segregated trial; compensation for persons killed or injured while exercising their lawful rights; and non-discrimination in the employment of persons in jails and courts and all facilities of justice.

The Senators omitted from their bill a provision in the draft prepared by a committee of well-known civil rights attorneys that would permit the Civil Service Commission to remove state and local police officials whose violation of their constitutional duty resulted in death or maiming.

Representatives Charles C.Diggs, Jr. (D., Mich) and Donald M.. Fraser (D., Minn.) have introduced substantially the same bill in the House (H.R. 12807 and H.R. 12818); but they included the provision for removing state and local police officials who fail in their duty.

The bills are being referred to the Senate and House Judiciary Committees.

National Civil Liberties Clearing House Annual Meeting Set

What can be done to end segregated justice in the South? Can our free society cope with its zooming crime rate without basic changes in our concepts of justice and due process of law? How can our expanding cities work to cure their spreading slums, increasing racial isolation, growing tensions, and other problems of the urban poor?

These are among the questions that will be discussed when the National Civil Liberties Clearing House holds its 18th annual conference in Washington, D.C., on April 21 and 22, at the new Washington-Hilton Hotel.

A major address on "The Supreme Court and the Bill of Rights over Fifty Years" by Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., will be the highlight of the conference banquet session.

Among other speakers listed for the national interorganizational convocation on civil rights and civil liberties issues are John Doar, Assistant Attorney General and head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division; Roger Wilkins, director of the Community Relations Service; Mayor Arthur Holland of Trenton, N.J., who himself has spearheaded his city's drive to maintain balanced neighborhoods by moving with his family into a near-slum house; James Farmer, director-designate of the new National Center for Community Action Education and past director of CORE; Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., counsel for the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights; and James Vorenberg, director of the President's National Crime Commission and of the Justice Department's Office of Criminal Justice.

More than 170 agencies—governmental as well as private—were represented at the 1965 Clearing House conference, and this year an even larger attendance is anticipated.

Lawrence Speiser, director of the Washington Office of the American Civil Liberties Union, is chairman of the Clearing House and of the conference. Co-chairmen of the conference program committee are Harold C. Fleming, executive vice president of the Potomac Institute, and Rabbi Richard G. Hirsch, director of the Religious Action Center of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Additional information about the Clearing House, which is an association of national organizations concerned with civil rights and liberties problems, or about its conference may be obtained by writing to Mary Alice Baldinger, executive director, National Civil Liberties Clearing House, 1637 Massachusetts Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C.-20036, or phone DuPont 7-6300 (area code 202)

Its theme will be "SOCIAL THEORY and SOCIAL INVENTION: The Translation of Ideas and Knowledge into Action for the Welfare of Society."

DAMPENING THE FAR RIGHT'S RING A number of members have written indicating that their communities have been plagued with the "Let Freedom Ring" campaign wherein a phone number is listed in the paper or given on radio and people are urged to call for a "patriotic message." The message has consisted of attacks on such persons as President Eisenhower, Adlai Stevenson, Chief Justice Earl Warren and Martin Luther King; such institutions as the United Nations, National Council of Churches, the PTAs' the Peace Corps and the ADL.

The Bell Telephone System, respecting freedom of speech, has refused to prohibit their being heard. But the parent company, its subsidiaries, and affiliates have done something about the situation. Hereafter, under new regulations, sponsors must include in the recorded message the name of the organization or individual sponsoring it and the address at which the "service" is provided. Failure to comply will result in termination. Exempted are such pre-recorded messages as time-of-day, weather, etc. etc. If this new regulation is not being followed in your community let us know here at the national office.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO DELINQUENT MEMBERS

The NAIRO Board of Directors, at its January meeting, instructed the staff to review the status of membership dues delinquency and to report to the Board at its April meeting. Behind this action is a growing dissatisfaction with the discrepancy between the number of members carried on the rolls and the income from membership dues. This discrepancy can only be attributable to dues delinquency.

All delinquent members were billed in the two month period of December-January and all are being billed again at this time. Some of the delinquents read like a "Who's Who in NAIRO." All members are urged to renew promptly when billed; delinquent members are in jeopardy of being dropped after the April Board meeting. One member reported to the office that another member, when urged to renew, had said, "Why should I pay my dues when I get the services anyway?" This, we believe, is a rare exception. We regard delinquents not as free-loaders but as busy persons who have let their dues notice slip by their desk and from their memory. We hope that this special notice will, as the lawyers say, "refresh their recollection."

MEMBERSHIP CERTIFICATES The long awaited NAIRO Membership Certificates are now available and will be distributed shortly to Members in good standing in 1966; others will receive their Certificates as they renew their dues or as they join NAIRO for the first time. The Certificate, itself, is a handsome thing—suitable for framing and hanging on a member's office wall. It is on "stock certificate" paper, carries the NAIRO Corporation Seal, and has the member's name hand-printed; medallions have been printed, carrying the year in which the membership is current...a new medallion will be added each year in which a member has renewed his or her dues. They are signed by the President and the Executive Director of NAIRO.

HERBLOCK DESIGNS BILL OF RIGHTS STAMP

A United States postage stamp commemorating the 175th anniversary of the Bill of Rights has been designed by Herbert L. Block, whose cartoons signed Herblock appear in The Washington Post and are syndicated throughout the world.

In an announcement on the stamp which the cartoonist was commissioned to design earlier this year, Postmaster General Lawrence F. O'Brien said, "We are naturally delighted that Mr. Block has joined the increasing number of topflight artists who are turning their talents to stamp designing."

Herblock, who has won all major journalism awards including two Pulitzer Prizes and four Sigma Delta Chi awards, has also won special recognition for his work on behalf of civil liberties and civil rights, for which he received Harvard University's Lauterbach Award and the Florina Lasker Award of the New York Civil Liberties Union. He expressed particular pleasure at having been asked to design the stamp on the freedoms guaranteed by the first ten amendments to the Constitution. His red-white-and-blue design shows the hand of freedom opposing the gauntleted fist of tyranny, and will be issued July 1st.

23rd ANNUAL INSTITUTE OF RACE RELATIONS

The famous Fisk Institute on Race Relations will meet for the twenty-third time this summer. Dates of the Institute are June 27-July 9. A group of experienced and skilled practitioners and outstanding academicians will serve as lecturers and an able staff will give direction to the Institute.

Participants come from every part of the nation and represent a wide variety of voluntary and governmental organizations. Among their numbers are teachers and students, clergymen and laymen, social workers and group workers, labor leaders and businessmen, members of human relations committees and personnel from government agencies. The specific purpose of the two-week program is to orient these actual and potential community leaders to the problems, processes, and methods of implementing better human relations.

Seminar meetings are held each morning from 8 to 12, with a half-hour coffee break between. These involve systematic presentations by speakers on various aspects of inter-group relations, followed by questions and discussion from the floor. In the first week the seminars are devoted to the broader context of human relations issues, and in the second specific problems in such areas as housing, education, politics, and economics, are studied.

Informal clinics are held in the afternoon from 1:30 to 3:30, allowing Institute participants to share their specific concerns and experiences. These groups are centered around problems in the fields of employment, community action, and religion and race. In addition, there is a special clinic sponsored by the United Church Women of the National Council of Churches.

The center for all Institute activities is the campus of Fisk University. Seminar discussions and clinic meetings take place in Park-Johnson Hall, the social science building. Living facilities are provided in modern dormitories, and meals are served in the university cafeteria in the Student Union Building, where recreational facilities are also available. Guides to the campus and to the city of Nashville are sent out in advance.

Payment of a fee of $80 will cover all expenses for registration, tuition, room and board. A very limited number of full and partial scholarships are available.

Institute participants may earn three semester hours of academic credit in either sociology or education, on either the undergraduate or graduate level, by fulfilling certain academic requirements.

1966 CONFERENCE, NOVEMBER 15-18, LOS ANGELES

The New Immigration Law (PL89236)*

by Vera Tate, Associate Secretary, Division of World Relief and Interchurch Aid

The new immigration law which came into effect on December 1, 1965, has been hailed by some as the long-awaited easing of United States discriminatory immigration practices. It abolishs the national quota system and widens the immigration regulations. Many critics, however, after studying the provisions in the law, feel that contrary to the expressed hopes of the late President Kennedy, Congress has opened one door and closed another, and that its provisions cannot be called "liberal."

The law is the result of lengthy congressional hearings and reflects adjustment to strong United States labor interests. It:

- eliminated immediately the Asia-Pacific Triangle provisions which made it impossible for persons of Oriental origin to emigrate to the United States.
- abolished the national origins quota system which will be fully effective on July 1, 1968, but, in the meantime, provides that any country may use the unused quotas.
- will operate in 1968 on a first-come, first-served basis within the annual 170,000 over-all limitation and the 20,000 limit per foreign state.
- established an over-all limitation of 120,000 persons annually, exclusive of "immediate relatives," from the independent countries of the western hemisphere.

This last provision providing a fixed ceiling of western hemisphere immigration is one of the most controversial features of the statute and was opposed by the Department of State as well as by many of the congressmen sponsoring the bill. Whether legislation changing the presently planned ceiling will be enacted will depend on the Select Commission on Western Hemisphere Immigration. This commission of fifteen, appointed by the President, Senate, and House, will study the law and recommend to Congress any amendments that may lift or eliminate the ceiling.

TYPES OF IMMIGRATION VISAS

There are two groups of visas for persons who plan to immigrate. The first include immediate relatives of natives of the western hemisphere, and some situations based on a logical interpretation of citizenship rights. Spouses, minor children, and parents of United States citizens are also considered in this category.

The second group of immigrants and their spouses and children are under a numerical limitation. These include in order:

1. Unmarried sons and daughters of American citizens.
2. Spouses and unmarried sons and daughters of permanently admitted aliens.
3. Members of academic professional groups or persons of eminent skills in the fields of science and arts.
4. Married sons and daughters of United States citizens.
5. Brothers and sisters of United States citizens.
6. Skilled and unskilled workers for occupations with a shortage in the United States.
7. Refugees from communist countries or the Middle East will receive 6 per cent of the total. However, refugees are distinguished from other immigrants by receiving permission for "conditional entry" which, although not called "parole", is a similar status. It can be changed to "permanent residence" two years after the conditional entry, at which time such conditional entrants will be inspected like new immigrants.

In order to prove the claim as "immediate relative" or as beneficiary of a preference category based on a relationship to a United States citizen, or to a legally admitted alien, the United States citizen or legally admitted alien has to submit a petition to the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

OUTSIDE THE PREFERENCE CATEGORIES

The law says that an immigrant visa would be available for persons who do not qualify within the preference categories, i.e., do not have either relatives or special profession or skills. The State Department will keep a special list of those persons awaiting their turn for obtaining visa issuance, not used in the preference categories. The distribution of visa issuance among these kinds of persons will depend entirely on the earliest registration date of the applicant -- first-come, first-served.

Visa issuance depends not only on the qualification introduced within the preference categories, but also on moral conduct and political security. All restrictions of moral conduct and political character remain.

PRESIDENT'S CORNER I think by now my views as to the crucial importance of chapter development to the life and effectiveness of NAIRO (as a professional association and to the day-to-day professional growth of each individual member as a professional intergroup relations practitioner) are well known to the membership. Lloyd Davis' Ad Hoc Committee on Chapter Development has and is rendering yeoman service to the Association in motivating effective chapter activity and in trying to ferret out the causes of less than exemplary performances from a few chapters whose past contributions have been numerous and continuous. This has been discussed by the Board and some recommendations will be presented to the membership for dealing with this problem.

I have felt, also, that because of the rapid expansion of the field of Intergroup Relations in recent years, particularly in the South and Southwest, new chapters were needed in locations of expanding activity so that present members (and others who should be) could enjoy the regular association of "kindred spirits" and deal more effectively with the problems of mutual importance in their immediate areas of activity. Thus, at some cost, no doubt, in the form of other matters that might have appropriately required his attention, I asked Fred Routh, our Executive Director, to visit several areas where members had expressed an interest in establishing new chapters. He reported this activity in some detail in the last Newsletter. It is sufficient to say this effort is contributing substantially to the out reach of NAIRO and to the professional growth of many who have felt themselves more or less isolated.

I am deeply apologetic that I have not been able to accept many invitations to visit chapters because of the pressure of work in a new job. However, I hope to do better in the coming months.

Good chapters are those that develop and carry out programs of interest to their membership. There is no substitute for this. My plans for assistance in this regard from the national office have not developed as rapidly as I had hoped, but they are definitely in the works. I am expecting a substantive report from Art Levin's Ad Hoc Committee on Program Development as of the July 23rd, Board Meeting and this will be passed on to you.

The NAIRO Commissions provide an appropriate resource for the development of chapter program. Each should keep abreast of the Intergroup Relations trends, critical issues, new problems and developments, etc., in its subject matter field and should impart this periodically to the membership in various ways.

I am asking each Commission Chairman to prepare for the July Board Meeting a brief statement indicating the present status of Intergroup Relations; major current issues, developments, innovations, problems; outlook for immediate future in his subject area. These will be submitted to the Ad Hoc Chapter and Program Development Committees for study and I hope they will represent the first step in development of guidelines for Chapter programs during the coming year. In addition, I am hoping that each Commission will want to participate significantly and programatically in the Annual Conference. Consequently, I am asking each Chairman to indicate to me before the July Board Meeting what his Commission's plans are so that they can be referred to the Conference Program Committee for integration into the total program.

It would be particularly meaningful at this time of rapid influx of new practitioners in the field, if our Commission Chairmen could coordinate their Annual Conference plans and their chapter program development contributions for 1966-67 in such a way that they would be mutually supportive and could, thus, render maximum service in professional growth to our membership.

At the April Board Meeting I was authorized to reactivate the County and City Public Agency Department because of the specialized needs this group has in its expansion in dealing with intergroup and poverty problems of the urban community. I have appointed Mr. Edward Marciniak to head this Department.

The Board also established a new Department to probe more deeply NAIRO's role in the broad new area of anti-poverty activity: The Department on Economic Opportunity and Development; and reactivated, with full appreciation of its new and expanded responsibilities, the Education Commission (which may be re-named if its new form and scope warrant it).

DIRECTOR'S BOX In the corridors or in after-hour bull sessions but not in the scheduled sessions of conferences on intergroup relations much is being said about growing anti-Semitism among Negroes and increasing racism among Jews. No statistics are available to show the extent of these two developments if, indeed, either exists; competent observers, however, have said that they sense both trends, particularly in communities in crisis situations. The question of what is happening to Negro-Jewish relations ought to be taken out of the corridors and put on the agenda.

The dimensions and facets of these two developments need examination. I would submit, for instance, that any increase which may exist in anti-Semitism among Negroes is not theologically based; this is not the anti-Semitism of fundamentalist Protestantism. In regard to any increase of racism which may exist among Jews, I would hold that this is not an acceptance of white supremacy; the KKK ideology is too close to the Nazi herrenvolk concept to be acceptable. Further, a caveat must be added to any discussion of this subject: what ever trends do exist, they exist among some Jews and among some Negroes and, without question, differ from community to community as well as from individual to individual.

The question of who—or what group—shall lead the civil rights movement and/or the liberal cause may well have contributed to both developments. Many Jews have long been prominent in most of the civil rights agencies; they have contributed leadership and funds; they have focused their sense of social justice on inequities based on race. Many Negroes, over the years, have done the same in cooperation with Jews and other whites. More recently, a segment of the Negro community and a part of the Negro leadership have held that Negroes, and in some instances

ACTIONS AND EVENTS AT THE APRIL 23rd

ACTION ON PETITIONS FROM NEW CHAPTERS. Fred Routh reviewed petitions from three groups to be chartered as NAIRO Chapters. He pointed out that each had taken the proper steps and met the requirements of NAIRO's ByLaws.

The Board took the following action:

Central Indiana Chapter—Approved

North Texas Chapter—Approved

Pacific Northwest Chapter—Approved but with the instruction to the Executive Director to advise the group the geographical area was too large to be practical; Chapter area should be smaller, though persons from the large area specified may be invited to all meetings. The Executive Director will negotiate area with Chapter leaders and report to the next Board meeting.

The Board voted to authorize the Executive Committee to act on receipt of proper petitions from the groups in Phoenix or Denver.

ACTION ON THE JOURNAL. The Board voted that an issue of the Journal should be produced; papers from the Chicago Conference were deemed suitable for the main content; the Editorial Board will decide which ones are to be used.

REACTIVATION OF NAIRO DEPARTMENTS. At the request of the Executive Director the Board considered the re-establishment of Departments. The Board voted to re-establish a Department of City and County Public Agencies and to establish a Department on Economic Opportunity and Development.

EXPANSION OF TRAINING CAPACITY. The Executive Director reported that an increasing number of federal and state agencies have asked about sending new, junior professional staff members to the Ten Day Introductory Institute for Interns. He said that there seemed sufficient interest among them and among private agencies that NAIRO should undertake a series of five day or one week Institutes for such personnel separate from the Intern Program. The Board agreed by consensus that this would be a proper function for NAIRO. The Board moved to refer the matter for further development to the Career Service Board.

AUTHORIZATION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEES. The board voted authorization for a committee to be appointed by the President to explore: 1. What programatic activities are appropriate for NAIRO; 2. Which should be given priority; 3. How may they be carried out, and 4. They should report to the Board hopefully at its July Meeting. At the request of several Board Members the vote was recorded on this motion: 10 yeas, 7 nays, PASSED. The President said that he would appoint the committee called for in the resolution promptly and that its composition would reflect the division on the Board.

Fred Routh said that he would also welcome the appointment of a committee to review the matter of delinquency and the meaning of "in good standing" as well as to review how this might be handled in reporting. He suggested that perhaps the committee could consist of the Membership Chairman, the Treasurer and Vice President, Arthur Levin. The President said that he would appoint a committee but wasn't certain at this moment of who should serve on it.

REPORT OF AD HOC COMMITTEE ON CHAPTER DEVELOPMENT. Lloyd Davis, Chairman, presented the report. He said that a review of Chapter activities as reported to him by Chapter Chairmen indicated:

1. That Cleveland, Kentucky, Mid-Central, Minneapolis & St. Paul, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Southern California, Southwestern Ohio are active and have responded to inquiries.
2. That Atlanta, Chicago, Connecticut, Detroit and Michigan, Massachusetts Northern California, St. Louis and Washington, while not reporting, have had some activities.
3. That the New York Chapter had not reported and apparently was inactive since complaints about lack of meetings had been received.
4. That the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh Chapters have been asked to develop a "primer" on how to organize and run a Chapter for guidelines for other Chapters.
5. That Fred Routh's recent trip will lead to the formation of Chapters in Dallas, Denver, Indianapolis, Phoenix and Seattle and to strengthened Chapters in San Francisco and Kansas City.
6. That most of the Regional Chairmen had not responded to inquiries.
7. That the need increases each day for membership promotional materials.
8. That the ByLaws should be amended, as he had previously suggested, to enable the Board to place in receivership any Chapter which was inactive for an extended period of time.
9. That a set of Model ByLaws would be helpful; and he has prepared same.

The Board voted to approve for submission to the membership at the Annual Conference an amendment to Article XVIII. (See page 8.)

Negroes alone, must assume the full leadership of the civil rights movement. Some of the cries that there is no longer room for "whitey" in a leadership position have been reminiscent of the TV advertisement "Mother, Pulease, I'd rather do it myself!" Some Jews (as well as other whites) have regarded this as a gross display of ingratitude. On the other hand, some Negroes have spoken harshly about Jews who have held on to leadership positions and "failed to make way" for Negroes. Undisciplined competition for leadership has, in the opinion of many observers, lead to increased hostility between Negroes and Jews.

Some observers feel that the role of the Jewish shopkeeper in the Negro ghetto has contributed to a deterioration of relations between Negroes and Jews. Charges of exploitation have been made and it is reliably reported that among the first items destroyed in the looting in Watts were credit records. It has also been reported that some of the Jewish shopkeepers in Watts felt that their stores were particularly targetted. Actually, I know of no statistics which show exploitation or gouging or, for that matter, how many

MEETING OF THE NAIRO BOARD IN ATLANTA

POLICE RECORDS CLARIFIED. Arthur Johnson, Chairman of NAIRO's Research Services Commission, asked for clarification of the request of the Board at its January Meeting that a report be made on the use and misuse of arrest records and police records which have a bearing on civil rights, civil liberties, and intergroup relations. The Discussion which ensued led to the consensus that, although the Resolution adopted at the Chicago Conference had specified only arrest and police records, the Research Services Commission was free to widen its inquiry to include conviction records, collection and use of crime statistics, FBI records and reports, and the use of arrest and conviction records and crime statistics by public agencies at the federal, state and city levels.

REPORT ON INTERN PROGRAM. John Feild reported that the third class of 25 Interns was completing the tenth month of their training. He said that the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation should be proud that the program, which they funded, had thus brought 75 new professionals into the field. He reported that this third class had met recently in Philadelphia for a mid-year seminar and that he and other staff members were impressed with the degree of development evident among the Interns since coming to the program. He added that no program now undertaken by NAIRO, or for that matter in the field, was more essential to its future.

Routh reported on a request NAIRO now has pending before the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation. He said that it presented two alternatives: 1. for two more classes and supporting funds; 2. for one more class with supporting funds. He explained that this had been done at the request of the Foundation staff. He also noted that NAIRO had requested the entire grant be made to NAIRO.

Mrs. Viola Kanatz said that the Career Service Board needs to get before the entire membership the good work that is being done in the Intern Program; not only about the good Interns but what we have learned about professional training in this field. She said a report, imaginatively done, could serve as a training handbook for agencies' new staff at the entry level.

1966 CONFERENCE PLANNING COMMITTEE REPORT. John Lyons, Chairman of the Committee presented the report after the President had expressed the appreciation of the Board for his coming from Los Angeles. Mr. Lyons reported that his Committee had suggested as the theme of the Conference: "Human Rights in the Great Society." He then itemized some of the areas the Committee proposed to cover:

1. It being the 20th Annual Conference, some appraisal would be in order, for the field and for NAIRO.
2. The closing general session of the NAIRO Conference will again, as at Chicago, be the opening session of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing Conference.
3. There will be a major session devoted to "The Neglected Minorities," particularly Latinos: Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans, and Cuban Refugees; also American Indians; chief emphasis to be Mexican-Americans.

The Board made the following suggestions:

1. That a major session be devoted to the problems of creating quality, integrated education in the cities.
2. That any review of the last twenty years should not be focused so much on "how well we've done" as a critical review of where we have been and what remains to be done—a critical review that could serve as a spring-board for further action.
3. That Negro-white relations be examined in terms of the roles of professionals and leadership; that Negro-Jewish relations be included with focus on tension resulting from (a) feelings of some Negro leaders and professionals that Jewish Professionals are blocking progress; (b) from ghettoized Negro perception in New York, Philadelphia, Los Angeles of roles of Jewish credit merchants and Jewish landlords and (c) Jewish fears, racism, "Backlash."
4. That time be provided to discuss methods and techniques, examine cases, inform and instruct newcomers to the field.
5. That a progress report on Watts be included in the program; it should include what has and hasn't been done to assist the area; it should be professionally focused.

The Board commended Mr. Lyons and his Committee for their work and asked that he carry this message of commendation back to his Committee.

MEMBERSHIP STATUS. The executive Director reported that a complete examination of membership cards indicated that NAIRO has 1083 members in good standing; that we have 289 who are in arrears. He commended Penny Wright for the diligent manner in which she had pulled this information together; he also explained that it had taken a goodly number of hours for Mrs. Wright and Miss Brenda Strong (a part-time staff member) to do so.

NCCIJ UNDERTAKES MEDICAL EQUALITY Education and action to secure equality in all phases of medical care and public health will be the purpose of a new project of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. Raymond M. Hilliard, chairman, announced the appointment of Sister Maureen Mulcahy, O.S.B., to the staff to organize the projected medical service programs. Sister Maureen, a specialist in the field of medicine, has been temporarily released from her hospital assignments by the Benedictine motherhouse at St. Benedict's, Minnesota.

In announcing the medical project, the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice cited problems of social justice to be met: a severe shortage of Negro nurses and physicians and ramaining problems of segregation in administering corporal work of mercy.

In releasing Sister Maureen for this service work, Mother Prioress M. Henrita of the community of Benedictine nuns stated that her community was glad for an opportunity to work to secure human rights. In her capacity with the National Conference for Interracial Justice, Sister Maureen will work out of the Conference's Chicago headquarters and also its Southern Field Service office in New Orleans.

RENT SUPPLEMENT PROGRAM UNDERWAY Secretary Robert C. Weaver recently announced that the Department of Housing and Urban Development is prepared to accept formal applications for rent supplement projects.

Assistant Secretary P.N. Brownstein, the Federal Housing Administration Commissioner, said forms, regulations and manual instructions had been sent to each FHA insuring and multifamily office. The FHA will issue mortgage insurance under the rent supplement program.

The FHA also has published a handbook which serves as a guide to prospective sponsors, lenders and others who will participate in the rent supplement housing program.

Funds for the program were made available after President Johnson signed into law the supplemental appropriation bill on May 13. The measure included $12 million for rent supplements.

Mr. Brownstein said there had been expressions of interest in the development of about 100,000 units of rent supplement housing. "A vast demand has been shown and we expect a large number of applications," he said.

The housing will be provided by new construction or major rehabilitation of existing housing. It will be sponsored and owned by private non-profit, limited dividend or cooperative organizations.

Mortgages made by private lenders will be insured by FHA at the market rate of interest.

Rent supplement tenants, whose income will be in the range of public housing requirements, will pay one-fourth of family income for rent. Any difference between their payment and the market rate of rent will be paid as a rent supplement by the Government to the owner of the property. As family income rises, the rent supplement decreases.

of the shops in America's Negro ghettos are Jewish owned or managed; the assumption of a great many Negroes, Jews, and other whites seems to be that most merchants in the ghetto are Jewish. What people think is true is often as important and sometimes even more important than what is actually true.

In many cities, Negroes moving out of the ghetto have moved into Jewish neighborhoods. Some Jews have fled, some have reacted with the same hostility that other whites often have, some have been accepting. I have had Negroes say to me "How come Jews run when we move into their neighborhoods? They used to live in ghettos; don't they know what we are trying to escape from?" And I have had Jewish persons ask, "How come Negroes seem to choose Jewish neighborhoods to move into? Why pick on us?"

In the Jewish tradition, education has long held an esteemed position. Some Jewish parents have voiced fears that desegregation will lead to a lowering of educational standards. To what extent this may have led to Negro resentment is unclear. What is clear is that there are a lot of questions to which we have no answers, only hunches. Is there increasing hostility between Negro and Jewish pupils? Between Negro and Jewish teachers? Parents?

Perhaps each of the NAIRO Chapters might examine in their own community what is happening to Jewish-Negro relations in general; in competition for leadership; in economic developments; in housing and move-ins; in the schools. We should not acquiesce with those who hold discussing it will make it worse; a professional examination may dispel misinformation and misconception and may show ways to combat this dual problem. Anti-Semitism and racism, like cancer, are seldom subject to cure by being ignored or neglected.

The NAIRO Board of Directors at its meeting of April 23, 1966, in Atlanta, Georgia, approved of the following amendment to the NAIRO By-Laws, to be submitted to the membership at the 1966 Annual Conference. The publication herein of this proposed amendment will serve as proper notice to the Membership that this proposed amendment will be acted upon at the Annual Conference.

Amendment to Article XVIII of the NAIRO By-Laws

"The NAIRO Board of Directors shall have the authority to place in receivership (into the hands of a receiver or others appointed to administer Chapter affairs during a period of reorganization) any chapter which has been inactive over such a period of time as to be detrimental to the best interests of its membership and the Association. The NAIRO Board of Directors shall also have the right to suspend or remove from office any Chapter officer whose conduct or inactivity is such as to do harm to his constituency and to the Association. The NAIRO Board of Directors will give consideration to a petition, signed by 20% (but not less than five members) of a Chapter's membership in good standing with NAIRO, for the removal of officers and the placing into receivership their Chapter."

NAIRO CERTIFICATES. We are happy to report that progress is being made in getting out the long-awaited NAIRO Certificates. The amount of work in doing so is considerable: each one must be hand-lettered, the appropriate year pasted on, the NAIRO seal stamped, and the signatures of the President and the Executive Director added. Please be patient if you haven't received your Certificate but your neighbor has his; you are not forgotten—he was just lucky that one of the gals doing the lettering chose his name first.

URGENT NOTICE TO MEMBERS The U.S. Post Office Department has notified all organizations holding bulk mailing permits that zip codes must be included in the addresses of all persons receiving bulk mailings. We have many of yours but will you please check the envelope in which this issue of the NAIRO Newsletter arrived and if it does not contain your zip code, please take five minutes and five cents and write your name, title, agency, address and zip code on a postal card and mail it to the national office. No fancy picture post card necessary.

JOHN HOPE, II, President

FREDERICK B. ROUTH, Executive Director

The Statler Hilton Hotel, Los Angeles, site of the 1966 Annual Conference

SPECIAL MEETING

A special one-day conference has been called for all staff and board members of city and county public intergroup relations agencies just prior to the NAIRO Annual Conference. The meeting will start at 8:00 P.M. on Monday, November 14th at the Statler-Hilton in Los Angeles. The meeting was called in response to many requests from staff directors of city and county agencies; it is being sponsored by the NAIRO Department on City and County Public Intergroup Relations Agencies. Edward Marciniak is Department chairman; K. C. Jones is serving as coordinator for the session. The meetings will focus on problems and programs unique to local public agencies. It is expected that the sessions will conclude the afternoon of the 15th so that participants may attend the opening session of the NAIRO Conference.

20th ANNUAL CONFERENCE

NAIRO's 20th Annual Conference, scheduled at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in Los Angeles, November 15-18, will focus on an appraisal of progress and goals for the profession. "This year's Conference, on our 20th Anniversary, will provide an opportunity for stock-taking," said John Lyons, Chairman of the Conference Planning Committee "but we see it more of an evaluation of 'where we are and where we should head' than a recounting of the past." The conference theme, Human Rights in The Great Society, embodies this philosophy.

Major presentations will include "The Legacy of Twenty Years," "Implications of the Cultural Deprivation Theory," "Urban Inter-Minority Group Relations," "New Goals for the Profession" and a final session which will serve as the opening session for the conference being scheduled by the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing.

Eight concurrent seminars will be held covering "New Challenges to the Intergroup Relations Profession." Topics to be covered are: 1. New Political Alignments; 2. Intergroup Relation Implications of the Anti-Poverty Programs; 3. The professional Operating in a Political Milieu; 4. New Challenges and New Roles for the Intergroup Relations Profession; 5. Cultural Implications of Employment Testing and Their Relationship to Job Criteria; 6. Title VI, Expectation vs Performance in Housing, Education, and Medical Services; 7. The Role and Function of Law Enforcement Agencies in a Democratic Society; and 8. Executive Leadership Training for Intergroup Relations Specialties—a Behavioral Science Perspective.

"Considerable emphasis will be given to the 'neglected' minorities: Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans, and American Indians," according to the Conference Committee. There will also be an examination of inter-minority group problems and tensions.

Registration for the Conference is set from noon to 5 P.M. on Tuesday, November 15th. The NAIRO Board will meet from 1:30 to 6 P.M. that same day. At 6 P.M. there will be two receptions: one sponsored by the NAIRO Officers and Board for New Members; one sponsored by the Los Angeles Chapter for Old Members.

REPORT AVAILABLE ON WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE The Report on the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights" is now available. It contains the original Report which was presented to each of the participants at the Conference, held June 1-2, 1966, plus a summary of the discussions and recommendations made by the participants. The 177 page document can become, as we said in the last issue of the NAIRO Newsletter, "an agenda for action" if its proposals receive the wide-based discussion, refinement and support to which they are entitled. It is particularly to be hoped that each NAIRO Chapter will secure a copy and make programmatic use of it during the forthcoming year. It may be purchased for $1.25 per copy from the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402

NEWSWEEK SPECIAL SENT TO ALL NAIRO MEMBERS As a service to the membership, the National Office has arranged to have a pamphlet, consisting of reprints from the August 22 issue of NEWSWEEK, sent to all NAIRO members. The pamphlet, entitled "Crisis of Color'66," will receive wide distribution. NEWSWEEK generously offered to provide this special issue without cost. The pamphlet is an up-dating of the extensive surveys done by NEWSWEEK in 1963, in which rank and file Negroes and whites and a selected group of 100 Negro leaders were asked questions about their attitudes on progress or the lack of it in employment, housing, education, public accommodations, politics and voting police-community relations, the ghetto, violence, and the future. While there are obvious local variations, this report serves as an inventory of where many thought we were in the field of race relations in the summer of 1966; from a previous edition of the Director's Box, I repeat "What people think is true is often, and sometimes more important than what is true."

PRESIDENT'S CORNER During the past year, I have stressed the importance, among other things, of NAIRO affording increasing means of fostering the professional growth of its individual members, e.g., expanding the network of chapters and strengthening their programs, expanding training facilities etc. There is no place where, and no time of the year when an intergroup practitioner can do more (and enjoy doing it) for his own professional development, his spirit and morale than at the Annual NAIRO Conference. For many, it has in one way or another served as a vehicle for improved status in the same job or a better job.

This personal development can be achieved faster and more happily in this tightly packed three days than any other way that I know, if the participant will fully involve himself or herself in both the formal and the informal aspects of the conference. Among the major sources of growth are the following:

1. Attending and fully participating in the formal conference program.
2. Meeting other members and, thus, cultivating lasting contacts, relationships, and friendships with one's peers—with similar interests, problems, programs, etc.
3. Taking the time and making the effort to gain a broader perspective of ones own job, to see ones own program in its relationship to the broader field and the general goals of sound intergroup relations, to take stock of oneself, etc. Freedom from the telephone for a few days of time not only to think, but to exchange ideas and compare ones thoughts with persons of kindred interests, is a rare privilege to be fully exploited in this period when creativity and fresh techniques are so needed.
4. Making contacts with potential employers if one is interested in a change in job. The NAIRO Conference has increasingly become an important market place for professional intergroup relations skills and one should not underestimate this conference activity because it is generally informal, frequently indirect, and subtle. Maybe we should be formalizing and expanding this service??
5. Having some real fun (and perhaps even relaxation) despite the full schedule and rapid pace of the conference, through the various avenues of informal association with kindred souls among the members present. (Don't neglect the hospitality room, etc.).
6. Finally, if ones tastes run toward it, a little politicking (in the constructive sense) is a part of a self-development program as well as a positive service to NAIRO.

With regard to the formal program of the Annual Conference, there appears to be a growing need to supplement systematically its program aimed at the interests of the general membership with meetings, working meal sessions, seminars, and concurrent sessions directed more specifically at the specialized needs of particular groups.

This has been done intermittently on an Ad Hoc basis at various Annual Conferences. But, I have in mind a more permanent arrangement which would in DIRECTOR'S BOX When, on September tenth, the wheels of Pan Am flight 107 (non-stop London-Washington) touched down on the runway of Dulles Airport, my European trip ended. I had visited Copenhagen, Oslo, Stockholm, Amsterdam, London, Dublin and Edinburgh; I had talked with citizens of those cities and with Americans visiting them. We discussed race relations in the United States, Rhodesia, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom. And most of the Europeans, with whom I talked, discussed Vietnam. In learning how others see us, I believe I have put into better focus my own vision of our strengths and weaknesses.

Many of the American visitors with whom I talked, particularly in the United Kingdom and Ireland, assumed I was English (their benchmarks of identification were moustache, blazer and gray flannels, and my somewhat unorthodox accent). Americans, apparently, will say things about themselves and their country to non-Americans more readily than to other Americans, or so it seemed on this trip. An interesting difference appeared between the opinions held by most older Americans and those of most younger Americans—with the dividing line somewhere between thirty and thirty-five. The younger group, many of them students, saw our problems as "winning the civil rights struggle," "ending the war in Vietnam," and "eliminating poverty." The older group identified "The Negro," "winning the war in Vietnam," and "taxes."

There was also, though to a lesser degree, an identifiable difference among opinions held by Europeans based on age grouping. The younger Europeans felt quite free to criticize our policies and practices in race relations and in Vietnam. The older group criticized us or at least our policies on Vietnam but many said "Since we don't live with the problem, it isn't entirely fair to criticize your efforts or lack of efforts to solve your racial problems."

Many young Europeans, including a number of West German students I met in Stockholm, spoke of the high hopes they had had for American policy when John F. Kennedy was President and of their subsequent disillusionment. A number asked "What do you know about Robert Kennedy?" An equal number, surprisingly, asked "What do you know about John Lindsay?" The accent was on youth, vigor and purpose.

In spite of all that has been said, I did not run into anti-Americanism any place I went—a dislike for certain of our policies, yes; a dislike for us, no.

American influence was visible everywhere I went: a best-seller in Dublin is a medal with St. Christopher on one side, President Kennedy on the other; Levi's or bluejeans were the "uniform of the day" among high school and college age youth; Hush Puppies were featured in many shoe stores; American singers and swingers dominated the record shops; the Mustang is a status symbol; swim-trunks were identified as "American style boxers," and American slang expressions were commonplace. A Scottish lass with whom I attended the military tattoo at Edinburgh Castle turned to me, when a unit of the Royal Air Force with a Negro in it marched by, and said "We're doing as

ACTION AND EVENTS AT THE JULY 23rd NAIRO BOARD MEETING IN WASHINGTON

Marilyn and John Feild provided a "happening" at their home for the Board the evening prior to the meeting; entertainment was provided by the Harold Fleming Trio; Fleming, vocalist and guitar; John Grimes, banjo and John Sweeney guitar. The benefit netted $300.

The President, John Hope II, reported that three new Chapters had been formed since the Annual Conference: Central Indiana, North Texas, and Pacific Northwest. A petition for Chapter status was read from a group of NAIROites in Arizona and the Board voted to grant them Chapter status. (Henry Cabirac serves as Chairman). John Hope commended Lloyd Davis for his work as chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on Chapter Development.

The Treasurer, Paul Rilling, reported that all debts were paid, that there was money in the bank but that NAIRO needed to find nearly $10,000 in new funds to see it through the year. He also expressed alarm about 1967 for several of our multi-year grants terminate with the current year. The Board agreed that special efforts at fund raising were called for and asked the President and the Executive Director to seek new funds from foundations.

Alexander "Joe" Allen, Chairman of NAIRO's Career Service Board, reported that more than 75 Interns had now been trained; that a fourth and fifth class had been proposed to the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation but the Foundation had not yet acted on the NAIRO proposal. In the discussion which followed it was agreed that if the Roosevelt Foundation did not make the grant, then the Career Service Board should go to another foundation with the proposal. The Board voted to use some funds-on-hand to publish a training manual for future Intern classes.

John Buggs, NAIRO President-Elect, reported for the Conference Planning Committee. (For details see front page story on Annual Conference).

The Board, after reviewing the period of extended inactivity of two Chapters, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

The Board of Directors regretfully revokes the Charters of the New York and St. Louis Chapters due to their extended inactivity, effective November 1, 1966 unless the following conditions are met prior to that time; 1. Two meetings of the membership be held, copies of the minutes, with a list of those attending be sent to the national office; 2. A program outline for 1966-67 be developed, copies sent to the national office; and 3. An election be held to select new officers, unless there has been an election within the last 12 months of this date. (Notice of this action was sent to all members of the two chapters).

K. C. Jones, Jr., read a proposal, which he had prepared, to secure funds to staff the NAIRO Department on City and County Intergroup Relations Public Agencies. The proposal was based on the increasingly recognized need of local public agency staff to have a clearing house for information; a training capacity; a regular bulletin; and consultative assistance. The Board voted approval and instructed the Department to move ahead in securing funds with the participation of the President and the Executive Director. The Board commended Mr. Jones for his proposal.

Reports were read from the Research Services Commission, Arthur Johnson, Chairman; the Commission on Housing and Urban Life, Edward Holmgren, Chairman; the Commission on Manpower Development, Edward Shelton, Chairman; and the Commission on Public Information, Joseph Manserrat, Chairman.

After full discussion, the Board adopted "Rules on Submission of Resolutions at NAIRO Conferences" as proposed by the Legal Counsel, Joseph Robison. (See box page 8).

LILLIAN SMITH DIES IN ATLANTA Miss Lillian Smith is dead; the small lady of great literary stature will no longer lift her pen and voice against bigotry. Her books Strange Fruit, Killers of the Dream, The Journey, and Now Is The Time were eloquent indictments of racism. Her speeches before many audiences called for equal treatment of all persons without regard to their race. She spent most of her life atop Old Screamer Mountain, near the town of Clayton in the northeastern corner of Georgia. Miss Smith was born in Florida, reared in Georgia, taught at a Methodist mission school in China, and published Strange Fruit in 1944. She received honorary degrees from Howard University and Oberlin College and was a Fellow of the Southern Regional Council.

ESCRU TO HOLD ANNUAL MEETING The Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity will hold their sixth Annual Meeting, November 10-13, at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York City. Among the speakers are: James Farmer, former national Director of CORE; Dr. Thomas Pettigrew, Associate Professor of Social Psychology at Harvard and author of A Profile of the Negro American; the Rev. John Harmon, author of several articles on "The Church, the City, and the Dispossessed"; The Rev. Gladstone Ntabati, Methodist clergyman from South Africa; and The Rt. Rev. Kilmer Myers, newly elected successor to The Rt. Rev. James Pike, as Bishop of California. For further information contact; ESCRU, 5 Forsyth Street, N. W., Atlanta, Georgia 30303

OLIVER E. HOLMES DIES IN GEORGIA The Rev. Oliver E. Holmes, Assistant Director of the Georgia Council on Human Relations has died in Atlanta after a long illness. Mr. Holmes was a member of NAIRO and was active with the Atlanta Chapter. Paul Anthony, Director of the Southern Regional Council, said "This is a sad loss for Oliver Holmes was not only a good professional, he was a truly fine person; we will miss his warmth as well as his wisdom."

NACD SEEKS CONSENSUS ON COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT The National Association for Community Development is seeking a broad national agreement on the principles, objectives, and procedures of community development. The NACD Board is establishing a broadly based committee which will include representatives of federal agencies, Congress, state and local government, business, labor and civil rights groups and universities, as well as their own membership.

A five man committee, of NACD leadership, was appointed to start the project. Named to the committee were: George H. Esser, Jr., executive director, the North Carolina Fund, Chairman; P. F. Ayer, executive director, the Council of Southern Mountains; John C. Bullitt, director, New Jersey State Office of Economic Opportunity; David G. Hill, executive director, Pittsburgh Mayor's Committee on Human Resources; and Philip J. Rutledge, director, Total War Against Poverty, Detroit.

NACD (often called "naked" by its members) is the association for agencies and their staff in the various anti-poverty programs around the country. NAIRO has had informal discussions with some of NACD's leadership about the possibilities of undertaking joint training efforts for "Urban Generalists," professionals who would be thoroughly knowledgeable about all the many problems confronting our cities.

time draw together under the NAIRO Annual Conference "umbrella" various specialized sub-groups within the intergroup relations (and related) field for more intensive consideration of their respective programs, problems, methods, etc. At the same time, the individual members of these groups should participate fully in the plenary sessions of NAIRO and profit fully from the cross-fertilization of ideas gleaned from plenary session programs that are focused sharply on the general needs of all professionals in the field with those derived from intensive consideration of more specialized needs of the sub-groups. In my opinion, we have made a highly successful beginning in our arrangement with the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing to have their conference immediately follow ours with some slight overlap and some joint use of facilities, and personnel. This plan will be in its second year at Los Angeles. We also plan to hold a one-day pre-NAIRO conference meeting of our new Department of City and County Agencies. Maybe next year, our Department of Economic Opportunity and other groups might take this step.

In time it may be necessary for the Annual NAIRO Conference and related group sessions to run for a week rather than three days and many of the sessions will have to be held concurrently but closely coordinated so as to minimize the overlapping of programs and sessions whose respective interest groups are identical.

But that is in the future. This year's conference promises to be significant; the pressing issues of the day and the longer range needs of the future are both on the agenda. I hope every NAIRO Member will make every effort to attend.

MEMBERSHIP DRIVE GAINS MOMENTUM The "Each One Get One" membership campaign is beginning to produce results. Quite a number of our members have used the membership promotional pamphlet, sent out in July, to recruit a colleague or friend. Now that Labor Day is past and most everyone is back from holidays, we hope that those members who have not yet done so will make a special effort to recruit at least one new professional to membership. The greater the outreach of your Association, the better are the chances for lifting practice and perception in the field; the larger the membership, the more influential its voice. As NAIRO President John Hope has previously said "Won't you please take the time and make the effort to help build our membership and increase the usefulness of your Association—NAIRO? We badly need your assistance; your reward will be a more effective professional association in the area of your chosen career." Additional membership brochures are available from the National Office.

NCDH CONFERENCE Against a background of turmoil and great social unrest in America's cities, the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing will sponsor the first of five regional conferences on November 18-20 at the statler Hilton Hotel in Los Angeles, California.

As a follow-up to the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights," held earlier this year, these five regional workshops will focus on the findings and recommendations adopted by the participants at that noteworthy meeting. The NCDH West Coast conference theme will be "Urban Crises and the Ghetto System: A Program for Grass-Roots Action." It will follow the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials (NAIRO) convention, which will be concluding as NCDH opens its deliberations at a joint luncheon session with NAIRO Friday, November 18. The NCDH meeting will close Sunday afternoon, November 20.

The major emphasis at this two-day workshop will be geared to the local fair housing movement throughout the Western States and the need to face the challenge of developing realistic, hard-hitting equal housing opportunity programs. The sessions will concentrate on citizen action programs to affect the nature of the housing supply, such as urban planning, 221 (d) (3), rent supplement, leased housing, vest pocket low-rent housing, as well as action to stimulate support and funding of fair housing centers by local anti-poverty boards.

ROBERT JOHNSON DIES IN OHIO Dr. Robert B. Johnson, long time member of NAIRO, died on Monday, August 22nd, in Wilberforce, Ohio. Known as "Doctor Bob" to the NAIRO Interns of 1956-58, he was Co-Director of their introductory institute, along with John Lassoe. He was the son of Dr. Charles S. Johnson, former President of Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee. John Hope II, NAIRO President said, "I have known Bob since he was a little fellow, this is a personal loss as well as a loss to the field of civil rights and intergroup relations. On behalf of NAIRO I express the Association's sorrow at the passing of a colleague who was held in affection and respect by all who knew him."

OUR PEOPLE & THEIR CITIES Spokesmen for almost every facet of the whole "urban complex" spent two days in mid-September at a conference entitled "Our People and Their Cities," exploring the growing list of problems faced by the two-thirds of the nation's people who live in cities.

Sponsored by Urban America, Inc., a nonprofit organization which seeks to improve the quality of life in every sphere of the urban environment, the conference speeches and discussions revolved around four main topics. These were housing, the work environment, transportation, and leisure.

But the range of the sessions extended well beyond talk of how to increase the annual output of housing units or debates on the relative merits of modes of transportation.

The vocational and geographic mix of the more than 800 conference delegates provided the ingredients for a free exchange of stimulating ideas. Besides city planners, architects, municipal officials and other traditional urban practitioners, there were social scientists, labor-union leaders, civil-rights workers, and a host of representatives of the broad field of "social engineering."

If a single consensus emerged from the conference it was this:

Any approach to urban problems must be a combined one, including a strong and constant concern for the social and economic as well as for physical aspects of city planning and development.

Concern for both the physical and the social was voiced forcefully, eloquently, and frequently. In a keynote address Harvard economist John Kenneth Galbraith cautioned against leaving the planning of the environment to the market place. Hubert Humphrey, Robert C. Weaver and John Lindsay presented major addresses.

Here are some examples of the diverse views that emerged from conference speeches and discussions:

• There was spirited talk about developing American counterparts of Scandinavian or British new towns to divert migration taxing already overcrowded metropolitan areas.

• Frustrating discussions arose over how to—and whether to—rebuild central city-ghettos; how to remold their neighborhood characteristics. (One sug-group Relations Public Agencies is sponsoring a preconference session for all local public agencies; plans call for a one day meeting, starting either the evening of Monday, November 14th or early Tuesday morning, the 15th. A special announcement will be sent to all such agencies in the country, whether or not the director is a member of NAIRO.

NAIRO President John Hope II said "This promises to be a very significant Conference—the pressing issues of today and the longer range needs of the future are both on the agenda. I think we will achieve at this conference an evaluation of the present situation, thoughtful planning for next steps, and a shared learning-experience for all who attend." He added, "I am pleased that the NAIRO Department of City and County Intergroup Relations Public Agencies and the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing are holding sessions contiguous with the NAIRO Conference for it will widen the base for participation in each of the meetings."

NAIRO President-Elect John A. Buggs, Executive Director of the Los Angeles County Commission on Human Relations, said "I am delighted that this year's Conference is being held in Los Angeles; it will enable many west coast professionals, with limited budgets, to attend and it will provide an opportunity for those from other sections of the country to better acquaint themselves with our problems. We need both a national perspective and an awareness of local variations. I look forward to welcoming old friends and new members to California."

well as you Yanks in integrating our Armed Forces!"

In Dublin's fair city (where, indeed, the girls are so pretty) I was attracted one evening as I strolled down O'Connell street, not far from where the IRA had blown-up the Nelson shaft, by the strains of "Blest Be The Tie That Binds." I discovered, at the corner of O'Connell and Abbey an evangelistic Protestant street service, complete with a P. A. system. The meeting ended with another Protestant hymn and an invitation to all to "come to the After-Meeting at the YMCA." I mentioned this to an Irish chap I later met and he said "Yours is not the only country which believes in religious freedom."

In Copenhagen I renewed a friendship with a young couple who had been stationed with the Danish Embassy, here in Washington. After nearly a year away from the United States they cited as what they found most unique about America was "the dynamic nature of your society, the diversity of your population, the physical vastness of your land, your ability to get things done, and your regard for individuality."

My last day in London a friend drove me to Grosvenor Square and said, "The two extremes of American taste are represented here; the gaucheness of that monstrous eagle atop your Embassy and the incredible generosity of Franklin Roosevelt."

Thus, I came home feeling that I knew myself, my fellow countrymen, and my country somewhat better because each had been exposed to me through the eyes of others. What we have here is something quite special; in spite of rough edges and rocky moments we are developing an identifiable American Character which applies to Negroes as well as whites; to Jews and Catholics as well as Protestants; to Southerners as well as Northerners or Westerners; to rural as well as urban dwellers; to the poor as well as the rich. Most Europeans I talked with saw this emerging phenomenon of a new nationality and believed in the gradual disappearance of hyphenated-Americans.

It seems rather proper to draw this particular piece to a close with a few lines from Scotland's beloved Robbie Burns:

O wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!
It wad frae mony a blunder free us,
And foolish notion!

gestion: "A wrenching, radical re-allocation of public resources," such as location of the proposed massive New York World Trade Center in Harlem.)

- The wry, oft-reprinted "Fable of How the Cities solved Their Transportation Problems" by Wilfred Owen of Brookings Institution was underlain with solid lessons on transit and traffic problems.
- Edwin C. Berry, executive director of the Chicago Urban League, gave a moving description of the "colonial characteristics" of central-city ghettos.
- There was an open invitation to unlimited innovation in planning and operation of parks and public-recreation facilities offered by New York City Parks Commissioner Thomas P. F. Hoving. Mr. Hoving rejected the "triad of monotony—the swing, the slide and see saw," in favor of "fact and fancy playgrounds."

Summarizing the conference, Urban America President Stephen R. Currier promised a thorough sifting of the hundreds of ideas the meeting generated. These will be incorporated, he said, in a "search for solutions" to urban problems on a national scale.

That process is under way. The best of the ideas are being abstracted and will be circulated in a variety of publications. The first of these, a booklet containing the five major speeches of the conference, will be off the presses in a few days. These will be available from Urban America's offices, 1717 Massachusetts Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C. Also available, in limited supply, are copies of a chart book used during the conference. This is a 96-page book containing graphically depicted statistical material about cities and metropolitan areas.

RULES ON SUBMISSION OF RESOLUTIONS AT NAIRO CONFERENCES

1. Resolutions will be considered at a business session near the end of the Conference, at a time specifically stated in the Conference program.

2. Resolutions will be submitted to the business session if: (a) they are received by the National Office at least one week before the beginning of the Conference or by the Resolutions Committee on the first full day of the Conference from any Chapter (majority vote of members or signed by any five members in good standing; or (b) they are adopted at a regularly scheduled session of the Conference by a majority vote of the members present and voting and submitted promptly to the Resolutions Committee.

3. A Resolutions Committee of five members, including the General Counsel of NAIRO if present at the Conference, shall be appointed by the President. It will be the function of the Resolutions Committee to place before the Conference at the appointed business session all Resolutions consistent with the By-laws and submitted in accordance with Paragraph 2, together with the recommendations of the Resolutions Committee. The Resolutions Committee may edit the Resolutions for clarity and may, in its judgment, combine Resolutions on the same or related subjects.

4. It is the opinion of the Board of Directors that Resolutions should be in the form of policy decisions of the Conference rather than public statements. This will save the time of the membership at the Conference by avoiding disputes over fine points of language. However, members retain the final decision, at the time of the Conference, as to the form Resolutions should take.

5. Members will be informed of the procedure governing the submission of Resolutions a reasonable time in advance of the Conference, but not less than 30 days before the Conference.

AILEEN HERNANDEZ LEAVES EEOC POST Mrs. Aileen C. Hernandez, former Chairman of the Northern California Chapter of NAIRO and currently national Membership Chairman, has resigned her post as Commissioner with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, effective November 10th. She responded with "no comment" when asked whether her resignation stemmed from published reports about her dissatisfaction with the EEOC's rate of progress in handling claims of discrimination.

Mrs. Hernandez received a five year appointment to the Commission in 1965; it was the longest of any of the five Commissioners' staggered terms. There are now two vacancies, out of five, on the Commission. In addition, four of the top staff posts remain unfilled. New Chairman of the Commission is Stephen Shulman, former Executive Vice Chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunities. Civil rights leaders are concerned with the Administration's failure to fill vacancies with dispatch.

PREFATORY NOTE

This brochure on Human Relations Workshops is the 5th or 1966 edition of an annual publication developed by The Council on Human Relations, Cleveland, Ohio. Miss Nell C. Henry of the Council's staff is responsible for its development.

Originally conceived as a handy reference list for intergroup relations practitioners, the brochure has become an important resource for educators, social workers and city officials. Its usefulness has grown as the human relations crisis has deepened and as the need for objective study and systematic training has become increasingly important.

Francis Keppel, U. S. Commissioner of Education, has been widely quoted for his terse "thank God for the Civil Rights Movement." Commissioner Keppel's comment indicated his satisfaction that, at last, the educational door was open and changes, needed changes, could be introduced.

Everyone of the approximately 75 workshops listed in this brochure is concerned directly or indirectly with these anticipated and necessary changes. Experience seems to suggest that these changes depend primarily on direct confrontation and continuing dialogue. And the workshop is, par excellence, the place or process where this kind of personal change most often and most readily takes place.

As a unique tool or instrumentality, the Human Relations Workshop, currently a modest and largely unadvertised development on the American educational scene, merits extended use. This brochure is published with this purpose in view.

The work of the National Training Laboratories is part of a massive modern trend, falling under the head of behavioral science. It is at Bethel, Maine, that Kurt Lewin's pioneering idea for the analysis of face-to-face groups has been given a practical laboratory testing year after year since 1947. Beginning in mid-June, three sessions are held, each of two weeks' duration, for participants from all walks of life. It is the primary business of NTL to study group reactions, to alert members to what is wrong, and what they can do about it. The three main goals are to increase the sensitivity of the individual to his own role and his own responses and help him express complicated or even negative attitudes acceptably, to provide new skills for conducting and diagnosing group meetings, and to develop methods of participation and leadership. Additionally, the "Bethel pattern" has expanded into laboratory sessions running two weeks for professionals in various occupational fields. Planned in close co-operation with leaders in these fields, these laboratories are tailor-made programs for a particular occupational group, and are held annually in various locations throughout the country.

IV RELATED PROGRAMS

THE LISLE FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM

The Lisle Fellowship offers the opportunity for students and young adults to participate in international summer programs in intercultural relations. The purpose of Lisle is to give young adults the challenge to experience the development of relationships with peoples of other cultures and backgrounds and to learn through practical fieldwork experiences about the ways of living and thinking in another culture. The programs take place in California, Washington, D.C., Jamaica, Puerto Rico, Denmark, Germany, Ireland, Colombia, Republic of Congro and USSR.

V HUMAN RELATIONS CENTERS

ALBERT M. GREENFIELD CENTER FOR HUMAN RELATIONS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA (Philadelphia)

Charged with a three-fold responsibility, the University of Pennsylvania's Center encourages and carries out both pure and applied research, offers courses of instruction with special emphasis on the graduate level, and engages in community service.

Fellowships are offered to doctoral students in allied areas on condition that they write their dissertations in the field of human relations. In addition to the staff's serving on advisory committees of intergroup agencies in housing, employment, public accommodations, and education, the Center also has an intern relationship with some of the city intergroup agencies. M. A. degree in Human Relations is granted.

CENTER FOR HUMAN RELATIONS AND COMMUNITY STUDIES OF NEW YORK UNIVERSITY (New York City)

At present, the program is entirely graduate in scope, with the exception of one course taught as an elective for persons specializing in the various helping professions.

The center is concerned with the integration and application of the behavioral disciplines for the purpose of furthering full human development. It seeks to make understood how the relations of people in schools and other institutions, in community organizations, in ethnic groups, and in regions and nations of the world may contribute to the maximum growth of all. It seeks also to teach the principles, arts, and techniques of successful performance in the many types of professional work in which its majors can apply the great concepts of the sciences of man.

COMMUNITY TENSIONS CENTER OF SPRINGFIELD COLLEGE (Springfield 9, Mass.)

The Community Tensions Center of Springfield College is an integral part of the institution with special responsibility in the area of intergroup relations. The center discharges this responsibility in three ways — at the graduate level through specialized instruction to students about to enter professional community service vocations — at the undergraduate level through general instruction to give students an understanding of community tensions and equip them with a minimum of skill to become responsible citizens in our multi-group society; and through basic and applied research in advancing knowledge in the broad field of intergroup relations.

In addition, the Center conducts workshops, institutes study programs and serves as a consultative service to community and professional groups.

HUMAN RELATIONS CENTER OF BOSTON UNIVERSITY (Boston, Massachusetts)

Focused on that part of the spectrum of personal relations that extends from interpersonal relations through group, intraorganizational and intergroup relations, to community relations, Boston's areas of responsibility include instruction (seminars and field service projects), research (basic and applied), and community service (short-term and long-term training programs, and consultation to particular agencies involved with certain intergroup problems).

Annual faculty conferences on relationships between human relations studies and various problems of university instruction, research, and administration; the provision of voluntary "unstructured" groups designed to support self-examination; fellowships to outstanding graduate and professional students, and a "living-in" summer workshop round out the Boston program.

SOUTHWEST CENTER FOR HUMAN RELATIONS STUDIES OF THE UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA (Norman, Okla.)

The basic purpose of the Human Relations Center is to provide opportunities for the study of human conflict and its resolution. To accomplish its purpose, the Center has three types of subgoals:

EDUCATION — to develop educational opportunities and intergroup experiences at the adult and graduate levels for professional persons and lay leaders. This is done through institutes, conferences, workshops, seminars, and other educational programs throughout the regular school year, and in summer sessions.

CONSULTATION—to provide consultative services to organizations and committees on inter group problems.

RESEARCH—to initiate and stimulate research in the field of human relations, to collect and disseminate research findings.

IMPORTANT NOTE:

Colleges and Universities conducting workshops during the summer of 1967 are asked no notify The Council on Human Relations as soon as their plans are formulated. The deadline for inclusion in the 6th Annual Edition of The Human Relations Workshops Brochure is March 1, 1967.

DATE: December 30, 1966

Please note the attached copy of a memo from John Buggs. May I ask that you consider his proposals and convey your recommendations to me. I will then pull together your recommendations and respond to John in the form of a consensus of our Chapter.

Thanks for your cooperation and best wishes to you and yours for the coming year.

NAIRO

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF INTERGROUP RELATIONS OFFICIALS
2027 MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE, N. W. • WASHINGTON 6, D. C. • 387-7050
FREDERICK B. ROUTH, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

December 22, 1966

Dear Chapter Chairman:

For several years NAIRO has placed the responsibility for research, information, points of view, suggested courses of professional action, continuing problems, etc. of the substantative areas of our profession's concern in the hands of various "Commissions" of our Association. Some of the commissions have done outstanding jobs over the years. Others have, from time to time been dormant.

Presently there are commissions of NAIRO authorized to operate in the following areas:

A. Manpower Development
B. Housing and Urban Life
C. Public Information
D. International aspects of Intergroup Relations
E. Inter-professional Liaison
F. Professional Standards
G. Public Policy
H. Research Services

Other areas of importance and urgency might also be listed as substantative concerns of NAIRO that require study and the development of a point of view. Such areas as:

A. Relationships between minority groups.
B. The positive and productive use of tension.
C. The American Indian - the most forgotten minority.
D. Compensatory education vs. the integrated school.
E. Black nationalism and its meaning to the field of inter-group relations, and many, many others that you may suggest call for a professional analysis.

Our NAIRO Chapters have for many years, sought a more meaningful relationship and a more dynamic role in the affairs of the association. At the meeting of the Board of Directors held at the close of the Los Angeles conference I suggested that the responsibility heretofore placed upon commissions for providing the services outlined in the first paragraph of this letter be shifted to local chapters - the chapters, of course, being willing.

At the January 20th meeting of the Board of Directors a decision will be made as to whether or not the commissions will be continued or chapters will be asked to assume the responsibility of doing an in-depth study of one of the substantiative areas of our mutual concern. If chapters are asked to provide this service, a written report to be made available to the entire membership would be required at the end of the year. (In this case, by September of 1967.)

Since this shifting of responsibility was my idea, I am naturally biased in favor of it. Chapters would be asked to select the area that they would be interested in exploring. Assignments would be made to conform as nearly as possible to the desire of the chapter membership.

I feel that such an arrangement has many advantages not the least of which is that of giving each chapter a real meaningful role in the affairs of the national body.

Please let me know at your earliest convenience - if at all possible prior to the January 20th Board meeting, your chapter's view of this suggestion. If you approve and give some indication of your chapter's choice of an area of concern, assignments will be made at the January meeting.

Cordially yours,

John A. Buggs

The Seminar will be practice-oriented. The major portion of their discussions will center on actual case studies, which the Interns have been asked to prepare. Enclosed is an outline which is being sent to the Interns for their use in preparing the studies.

We are asking them to have the studies submitted by not later than Friday, February 25. In view of the timing of this Seminar, we are relieving the Interns of the obligation of submitting a six-month report. We have, however, suggested to them that we would welcome any comments they might wish to make, either on their own initiative or in response to reports made by their supervisors.

As you will recall, this Seminar is being paid for on the basis of agency contributions of $100 per Intern, the total sum of which will be matched by NAIRO. If you have not already done so, would you please sign and return the "Amendment to The Letter of Agreement" to me. We are now asking that you send in your agency's contribution. PLEASE MAKE OUT ALL CHECKS TO NAIRO AND FORWARD THEM TO:

Nate Greene
Intern Program Consultant
2006 Spruce Street
Philadelphia, Pa. 19103

NAIRO will assume responsibility for all attendant expenses including the Interns' travel and maintenance. Interns in Chicago, Atlanta, Louisville, Huntsville, and Columbia, will be reimbursed on the basis of Air Coach flight plus ground travel expenses. Interns in the D.C., New York and Connecticut areas will be paid for coach fares by train.

Thank you in advance for helping to make this Seminar possible.

Dear Jack:

The copy of your letter to the Civil Rights Commission regarding the inaccuracy of our reports confuses us. Our research department can find no properly dated reports in which the Escambia Coutny situation is not accurately stated. And, our last report on parochial school desegregation was issued in August, 1963, prior to action by the parochial schools of Pensacola.

Lord knows we make plenty of mistakes, confess to them, and do whatever possible to correct them. But we take the responsibility of accuracy very seriously.

Can you give us more specific information on the inaccuracies to which you refer?

Sincerely,

Paul Anthony

NATIONAL CATHOLIC CONFERENCE FOR INTERRACIAL JUSTICE

Report of Executive Director, 8/65 and
Program Goals, 1965-1966

National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice

Report of the Executive Director
August, 1965

A major effort of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice is to search and program for ways to effectively relate the interest, energy and resources of the larger Roman Catholic community to improving race relations. Through service work to an expanding network of Catholic human relations organizations and the development of specialized programs for administration at the local diocesan level, the effectiveness of the work of the Conference has been significantly enhanced during the past year. While the Conference cooperates in a variety of programs with other civil rights organizations, a major concern is with the response of the local Catholic community to the crisis in human relations, whether this be in the North or South.

1965 has marked a significant step-up in the commitment of Catholic resources on behalf of interracial justice. The number of Catholic human relations organizations is now over 120; a growing number of local Catholic human relations organizations are developing staffed programs. There is increasing inter-diocesan sharing in crises as well as other program situations, expressing the best of collegiality stimulated by the second Vatican Council. While there are gaps in effectiveness, the commitment of the Catholic bishops, as pastoral leaders, has become more vigorous and is beginning to express itself in solid local level programs, many of them created in consultation with the Conference. National church structures are becoming increasingly involved in civil rights programs through their own constituencies.

Yet the Catholic community is so large, and its institutional complex so extensive, that there is a long way to go to adequately relate these resources to forging a just society, and to moving the conscience and deepening the commitment of Catholic laymen on civil rights issues. Catholic lay and clerical leadership is still too distant from leadership in the movement in the Negro community; there is a gap here which will pose major problems for the Church in gearing up to a more adequate response to the opportunities to work for racial justice in Northern communities especially. Overall the Catholic community seems far from the reality of the slum ghetto filled with frustration and despair. Some cities give evidence of a growing split in the Catholic community over the issue of a developing local civil rights movement. With the direction along which the Catholic Church was beginning to accelerate, should such a split occur, it would be tragic indeed.

The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice involved itself in a variety of issues this past year. Selma...the summer projects... the voting bill, reapportionment...a variety of emergency services... in all of these the Conference worked to relate local Catholic resources to national issues, and to quicken the response of the Church.

In a large number of situations and on a large number of programs, the Conference continued its open work with both official and unofficial organizations of other religious denominations.

In 1963 the Conference began to program relative to the economic issues which so hindered the full participation of Negroes and certain other minorities in American life. These efforts were extended this year in a variety of ways, most notably by trying to give prominence to the creative programs underway on the grass roots level involving Catholic leadership, and by the 1965 Conference convention on "The Human Face of Poverty: Challenge to Interracial Action." In the educational field a pilot project was worked out with a religious order of women and the Catholic Interracial Council of Chicago to provide sophisticated manpower for a summer free school, which next year may expand to a number of cities.

A major portion of the Conference program goals for 1965 have been achieved. Services to Catholic human relations organizations have been increased; the work of the Southern Field Service has been significantly strengthened; a Department of Educational Services has been organized and staffed; and a Department of Employment Services has been launched. Within the Department of Employment Services, "Project Equality," an effort to relate the purchasing resources of Catholic institutions to end discrimination in employment in the concerns dealing with those institutions, is successfully underway.

Council Services

Increased coordination of local Council work on selected national issues, and work done by specialized Conference departments highlight increased services to the growing number of Catholic human relations organizations serviced by the Conference. Routine servicing of this base of organizations has been stepped up, and beginning in the fall of 1965, full time staff attention will be given to this area.

One major effort relating Conference service to local Catholic human relations organizations and broader program interests involving the larger network of Catholic institutions focused on the 1965 convention, "The Human Face of Poverty: Challenge to Interracial Action," jointly sponsored with the National Catholic Social Action Conference. The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice acted as staff for this meeting, designed to relate grass roots leaders in the War on Poverty and the local Catholic human relations organizations more effectively to the larger institutional resources which are gradually becoming more deeply involved in service to the poor.

The Conference served as the coordinator for local Catholic human relations organizations relative to the Selma crisis, the effort to educate on the issues involved in discrimination in voting, on summer projects, and in a myriad of other instances.

Increasing requests for a wide range of consultative and program services from local Councils will make adequate use of the new resources the Conference is making available in this area. In turn, the expansion and growing sophistication of local affiliates substantially strengthens the ability of the Conference to program more effectively.

Southern Field Service

Emergency services, the Selma and Bogalusa crises absorbed a portion of the energy of the Southern Field Service. Liaison with the "movement" in the South was quickened. But key emphasis was placed on two major conferences for Catholic leadership in 25 Southern dioceses.

Late in March the Conference met in Memphis with Catholic leaders voluntarily involved in civil rights work in the South. The meeting was called to break some of the isolation frequently felt by people working without much communication with each other, to share experiences and program ideas, and to broaden the Conference's organizational base in the South.

In July the Conference staged a meeting in Atlanta for about 200 lay, religious and clerical leaders, from 22 of 25 Southern dioceses served by the Southern Field Service. Co-sponsored with Archbishop Paul Hallinan of Atlanta this conference was designed to involve more deeply in race relations those laymen, religious and clerics most responsible for the development of policy and program in all areas of Church institutional life in the South.

Both the above programs seem to have accomplished their purpose, and the Atlanta conference will undoubtedly have important effects for the contribution of the Church to racial justice in Southern states, for it involved with the Conference many of the influential leaders in Church life in the area. Followup on both of these conferences continues.

A more detailed report on the work of the Southern Field Service, including its important service in Louisiana, a project with other religious denominations and development work in the "War on Poverty" is available under separate cover.

Department of Educational Services

Launched with a partial grant in September 1964, the Department of Educational Services accomplished most of its initial two year program goals in its first year, and has already expanded its concerns and staff.

The leadership of Sister Claire Marie Sawyer, O.S.F., on leave as Chairman of the Sociology Department, Alverno College, involved the Conference in a myriad of programs with diocesan educational systems, and in the human relations training of women religious staffing key positions in the extensive network of Catholic sponsored educational institutions.

Major accomplishments include the development of a "Nuns Newsletter" for a growing circle of women religious anxious to trade experience in race relations, service of the poor and related areas. The Department has published a variety of materials for interracial youth education, including a 15 day teaching unit for use on the secondary school level, as well as materials and kits for the pre-service and in-service training of teachers.

A traveling workshop of five women religious with Ph.D. degrees in a variety of fields, was funded and put on the road during the summer of 1965, giving week long and briefer courses in human relations in a number of parts of the country. This training experience has become the core for expanded goals in the training field this coming year.

In cooperation with the Catholic Interracial Council of Chicago and the Sisters of St. Francis of Rochester, Minnesota, the Conference secured an Office of Economic Opportunity grant to enable 15 highly trained nuns to experiment with a "free school curriculum" in a public housing project setting. The project proved exciting, and will be extended to additional cities and religious orders in 1966.

A more detailed summary of the programs of the Department of Educational Services is available under separate cover. Overall the efforts of Conference educational specialists have begun to meet a gap in the Catholic educational system, and to relate the Conference more deeply to the Catholic institutional structure in meaningful ways.

Department of Employment Services

The Department of Employment Services was launched with "Project Equality" as its initial focus, an effort to enable the Church institutional structure to use its economic involvement by purchasing responsibly in an affirmative way to root out patterns of discrimination in employment.

Considerable research in advance of the initial pilot project enabled staff to develop a program which would fit the institutional and administrative patterns of the Catholic Church. The program has been launched in three pilot areas -- the Archdioceses of St. Louis, Missouri. Detroit, Michigan and San Antonio, Texas. When fully implemented in any one geographic area, the project will harness the general purchasing, building, real estate, investments, insurance and banking of Roman Catholic jurisdictions to an effort to eradicate discrimination, and to make sizable job gains for members of minority groups who have been screened out of full participation in the economic life of the United States.

Experience to date indicates that "Project Equality" can realistically be expanded on an interreligious basis -- one of the goals of the program-- and that it will expand to additional areas of the country as staff time is available. Every initial evaluation indicates the carefully designed project will have significant impact, part of which will be measurable. It also seems likely that Conference organization and coordination of the project can be sustained beyond the two or three year pilot phase of the program by fees from jurisdictions launching the program.

A more detailed report on the Department of Employment Services and on "Project Equality" is available under separate cover.

Administration

It is impossible to detail all of the relationships of the Conference to developing program around the country and to the major civil rights issues in the United States. But during 1965 the Conference served with a greater measure of freedom and confidence, and at the same time was able to relate its services more effectively to the larger institutional structure of the Catholic community. Expansion of the Conference program and a number of major new program interests required increments in staff and budget. Most of the Conference work to date has been adequately funded, but response to several problems -- especially in northern urban areas -- has been inadequate because of limited resources. A full time person is being added to the staff with responsibilities in fundraising and development, to make possible more adequate work in 1966. Finally, expansion of the Conference programs and staff have necessitated leasing of larger and more adequate office space, effective October 1, 1965.

National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice

Program Goals - 1966

The dimensions of the racial issue have become sharper in the few years of the life of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. This sharpness, as it is reflected in varying modes of action on racial issues in community life, is reflected in the diversity of the interracial movement within the Catholic community. On the one hand, episcopal leadership in teaching principle clearly and in organizing the use of institutional resources responsibly to work for an end to racial discrimination is far more advanced then when the Conference was founded in 1960. On the other hand, the same tensions over "the movement" in broader society are felt in a growing number of places in the Catholic Church.

In this mixed but encouraging setting, the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice reaffirms its commitment to the creation of a vital and free society, its service to the civil rights movement and to the Catholic Church, that the Catholic community may better respond in creative fashion to the urgent needs of our time.

In broad perspective, the objectives of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice and its affiliate groups have been to eliminate from within the Catholic community any remaining vestiges of racial discrimination and to encourage the flow of the resources of the Catholic community into efforts to secure interracial justice in the civic community. Particular programs and tactics vary widely on the local level among the Catholic human relations groups affiliated with the Conference. In addition to service of these groups, the Conference has worked with them in developing programs which will relate the structures of diocesan life more meaningfully to the struggle for racial justice. The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice is in this sense a service agency, working to stimulate and aid the response of the local church. In addition, the Conference represents its affiliate organizations on the national level and attempts to coordinate and give leadership relative to national civil rights issues. The services of the Conference are available to all, regardless of creed, color or national origin.

While the general direction of the Conference's program will continue, including its broader interest in other social and economic problems related to race relations in the United States, below are detailed specific program goals for 1966.

Council Services

The Conference will assign full time professional staff to a variety of services related to the development of local Catholic human relations organizations -- both Catholic Interracial Councils and official diocesan commissions on human relations. This assignment will make possible regularizing the newsletter and other mail services to the Councils. Relative to specific national civil rights issues, the Conference will continue to coordinate the efforts of the Catholic interracial movement into an effective response in tandem with the efforts of other denominations and civil rights groups.

Conference staff will focus additional energy on field work with the Councils in efforts to increase local level strength and relevancy to local issues. Efforts will be focused especially on those communities where there is potential to develop staffed Councils: these areas frequently coincide with the larger urban areas of the country. In this development work, the appropriate Conference staff member will relate the specialized services and programs of the Conference to local leadership.

Finally, the Conference will focus on providing occasion for regional leadership training and planning as well as staff development.

Southern Field Service

The Conference Southern Field Service project will continue past program objectives to increase the number of Catholic human relations organizations in the Southern states and to quicken the response of the church to the racial crisis. When the Southern Field Service project was launched there were no Catholic human relations organizations left in the 15 state area the SFS serves: there are now 24 such organizations, demanding increased service and program consultation.

1965 SFS energies were heavily involved in two major conferences. In 1966 an expanded SFS program will rely more heavily on travel consultation in Southern dioceses, focused on response to local civil rights challenges and to extending the more specialized Conference services in employment and education in these areas.

Following up on two major regional conferences held in 1965, the SFS will work to organize leadership conferences in sub-regions of the South, to reach more deeply into local level Catholic leadership in sharing race relations program experience.

SFS and the Conference's Department of Educational Services will cooperate in staging a planning conference on hospital desegregation at the request of a group of Catholic hospital administrators in the South. This request grew out of the 1965 leadership conference co-sponsored with the Archdiocese of Atlanta. A variety of other opportunities for followup arose in that conference and will be pursued: specialized services for Catholic school superintendents, vocations directors, religious orders largely serving Negro Catholics. The focus of the followup will be on developing and implementing plans leading to desegregation in the life of the church and deeper involvement in civic desegregation.

One of the key requests made by Catholics at the Atlanta leadership conference was for the planned abolishment of the double parish system, whereby Negro and white Catholics are largely separated and which has inhibited meaningful and extensive racial integration. The SFS will devote its resources to change this system.

In Southern states, even though usually small in numbers, the Catholic community has an institutional network which lends to the development of area wide programs to combat poverty. The SFS will continue its efforts to seek intensive support for Southern dioceses and religious orders in setting up area wide anti-poverty programs in relation to the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Office of Manpower, Automation and Training in the U.S. Department of Labor. SFS efforts will attempt to involve the Catholic community along with other religious denominations in these programs.

Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which uses the spending leverage of the federal government to eliminate discrimination in receiving bodies, offers the greatest potential for extensive increasing integration in a host of social institutions. Along with Conference general staff, the SFS will involve itself in training leadership of Catholic human relations organizations in techniques under Title VI and in organizing campaigns to make the use of Title VI increasingly effective in all federal departments and agencies.

The SFS has been involved with various Protestant denominations in a "Team Ministry" in various cities, an effort to build interreligious organizations able to give a new leadership to these cities in race relations. Based upon an evaluation of the effectiveness of the planned "Team Ministry" approach, the SFS may try a modified approach in other cities in the South.

SFS will continue to relate to crises situations and to the major civil rights organizations to evoke a greater response from the local church and to relate the voluntary resources of the wider Catholic community to well planned and expanding projects in the South.

Finally, the Southern Field Service, along with the rest of the Conference staff, especially the Department of Educational Services, plans to structure programs for volunteers which will enable Catholics and especially women of religious orders to perform specialized summer work in those dioceses suffering from a shortage of workers. This particular service will largely be geared to the educational and anti-poverty areas. The need for summertime and year round volunteer help in these areas is becoming increasingly great.

Department of Employment Services

"Project Equality," the initial program of the Department of Employment Services, is now in its pilot stages in three dioceses -- St. Louis, Detroit and San Antonio. A number of dioceses have requested organization of the program in their areas and will be launched in 1966. During the second year of its pilot phase, "Project Equality" will reach out to cover construction, real estate, insurance and banking, in addition to general purchasing, in winning merit employment gains both in church institutions and in private business concerns dealing with church institutions.

The Conference sees the need for an expansion of "Project Equality" staff and for an extension of the pilot project to cover a third year. A proposal to this effect will be developed in an effort to finance this extension of the program. It is the Conference's intention to have "Project Equality" operating in over 40 major areas by the end of this period.

In the city of Detroit in cooperation with the Archbishop's Commission on Human Relations, Convention staff has already taken steps to organize "Project Equality" on an interreligious basis. The Department of Employment Services also held an interreligious consultation on "Project Equality" with staff of major denominations. Following up on these developments, the Conference will work to organize "Project Equality" nationally on an interreligious basis with the Secretariat remaining at the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice.

The Conference has also established the following 1966 goals for the Department of Employment Services:

1 A complete financial study of "Project Equality" pilot projects in order to know what it costs the Department to operate the program and to accurately forecast the overall three-year program cost for other dioceses and jurisdictions.

2 Opening two new pilot projects in religious communities of men and women.

3 Preparing or stimulating a study and report of findings of the relevancy of various types of employment tests to the applicant's ability to perform the job.

4 Engaging and training an assistant director of the Employment Services Department to carry out field supervision, administration and coordination of "Project Equality" programs.

5 Training diocesan merit employment directors who will be appointed in the fifth to sixth month of the local program.

6 Developing a new program to combat discrimination in state employment services.

The Department of Employment Services believes it can establish sound programs in Catholic institutions on a self-liquidating financial basis. In spring 1966, the Department plans to publish a manual on "Project Equality" so that it can be expanded much more rapidly throughout the Catholic and other denominational communities.

A more detailed description of the "Project Equality" program service is available under separate cover.

Department of Educational Services

The broad objectives of the Department of Educational Services organized one year ago will be continued and extended. It is the task of this Department to so organize and provide services which will make the Catholic educational system relevant to problems of race and poverty around the country. In addition the Department work expresses Conference interest in the manifold civil educational problems of the day. Two years of program goals were largely accomplished in the one year this Department has been operative. Its direction and program are well known, and the 1966 focus will be on the elaboration, organization and extension of services already begun. This will necessitate expansion of staff and resources, and particularly require Conference recruitment of a dedicated brother to join the Department staff.

A steering committee of experts in curriculum, intergroup relations, theology, etc., will be formed to assist the Department in the planning and methods of carrying out its goals. It is hoped that the combined vision and insight of these counselors will give the broadened scope necessary for pursuit of the goals. This advisory council will be organized around sisters who have already been involved in the Conference program, especially the Traveling Workshop and other projects of the Department of Educational Services. With this guidance, it is hoped that the Department will continue to assume something of the role of a catalyst in ideas that move the religious sisterhoods forward in their work for all men.

"Operation Motherhouse" will be launched as a pilot project in selected religious communities. "Operation Motherhouse" is a plan for the self-study of religious communities as they are relevant to problems of poverty and race, the formation of religious order committees on human relations with concern and responsibility for the overall programming for growth in the sisters' awareness, commitment and involvement in social action. The Conference envisions these committees to have both advisory and administrative responsibility for religious order programming in these areas. A draft plan is already prepared and will be explored in coming months with leadership of religious orders of women.

"Project Cabrini" and other summer volunteer work, mainly for sisters, will be emphasized through a summer-work processing center in the Department. Two religious congregations have already volunteered to undertake "Project Cabrinis" and have requested consultative services from the Conference. An effort will be made to use the Cabrini war on poverty effort to involve additional groups of dedicated women in specialized summer service of the poor.

Program materials that would prepare others to extend the goals of the Department will be put in kits, discussions guides and tapes to be used by high school teachers of the social studies in order for them to go into elementary schools and lead day long or half day workshops. This will give high school teachers who are usually a bit more prepared in their area of concentration the opportunity to meet the youngster before he comes to high school in an area of grave concern. It can aid the Department in extending the kinds of services it would like to furnish but which is limited because of the scarcity of staff.

Experimentation and improvements will be made with the kits of materials presently available from the Conference for in and pre-service teacher training. Outlines with program aids and suggestions will be developed and will be available shortly for use in parent-faculty groups. Kits containing significant reprints and short bibliographies will be available for purchase through the Conference. A limited number of tapes and films will be available for rental, along with suggested programs built around these audio-visual aids.

A major Department interest lies in the complex of problems connected with issues of de-facto segregation in education. A Conference study document on the problem in both public and parochial school educational settings will soon be available, and this interest will be pursued through the year as program possibilities clarify.

The 15 day secondary school teaching manual, Study of Race Relations, already published by the Conference, will be ready in September for publication for public school use, and a revised edition, based on its use by teachers in 1964-65, will be ready for continued parochial school use.

An extensive bibliography on the socially disadvantaged child will be ready for distribution by early fall, 1965, and a small bibliography of children's books in the area of intergroup relations will be published several months later.

Based on 1965 experience, the Department hopes to organize three summer-1966 Traveling Workshops in Human Relations, offering intensive in-service training to parochial and public school teachers and other personnel, such as police officers, in various parts of the country. Members of the 1965 Travel Workshop team will comprise teams or panels of lecturers to assume some of the speaking and training engagements for the Department in the coming year. Experimental efforts will be launched with more specific training objectives, as the opportunity arises and personnel and financing become available.

The Department of Educational Services has made some efforts to gather materials on curriculum studies as these studies affect the area of race relations. During the coming year a more intensive study of these efforts will be undertaken and a summary of findings will be prepared. The Department itself will continue its own evaluation of textbooks, particularly in the area of social studies, and the revised readers used throughout the United States in elementary schools. This service will be broadened in scope as publishers gain momentum in adapting to current racial realities.

Special attention to youth education for interracial living will also be given in the completion of a report on structures and programs for Junior Catholic Interracial Councils. The Conference is presently entertaining a request for a national meeting on this subject called by the existing Junior CICs.

Finally, the Department hopes to solidify explorations on interfaith programs in the youth education area. The Conference has received repeated invitations by a variety of groups interested in becoming associated in some aspect of the work of the Department. These groups include the Missouri Lutheran Synod (particularly its Committee on the Education of the Child in the Inner City), the American Jewish Committee, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the National Conference of Christians and Jews. Interested in the aspect of "Christian-Jewish Relations" are the Sisters of Notre Dame de Sion of Kansas City, Missouri, who have asked to become part of any programming or planning the Conference undertakes in this area.

Special Projects

Several program interests involve a combination of existing Conference services or fall outside present specialized services but will, nevertheless, be explored and undertaken if resources are available.

SAIL The Conference has already worked with seminarians in developing a plan for extended services and opportunities for training and experience in intergroup relations for students of seminaries. Every effort will be made to launch the Seminarian Alliance for Interracial Leadership in the coming year, as well as to explore additional services with seminarians and seminary educators.

Pastoral Services The Conference hopes to serve as secretariat to the Clergy Conference for the Interracial Apostolate and work in other ways to enable Catholic clergy to be more adequately equipped to offer pastoral services in the area of racial justice. Under active consideration is a handbook for parish priests which would supply a variety of needed aids in this pastoral work. As additional staff becomes available, particularly staff with experience in the pastoral field, a more concerted effort will be made, and in cooperation with other organizations, to produce useful race relations program concepts and materials for use on the parish level.

Family Life Services The Conference will work to stimulate a planning meeting and followup activities among Catholic organizations in the family life education field to provide special services in inner city areas with high incidence of deterioration in the family structure. These program interests will be related to other concerns in the "war on poverty" and also to the race relations education and programming of existing Catholic family life organizations.

Legal Services The Conference plans organizing efforts to encourage more Catholic attorneys to offer their services in the area of civil rights and in meeting the needs of the poor in new and creative ways. An effort will be made to forge an informal association of Catholic attorneys, affiliated with existing Catholic human relations organizations, who could sustain staff counsel for the Conference to enhance cooperation with such groups as the Legal Defense Fund of the NAACP and the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee.

Housing A major area for Conference development in 1966 will be the elaboration of a program scheme in the field of urban services, with a concentration on racial discrimination and resulting problems in housing. On the basis of this scheme, the Conference will undertake to raise funds outside of its budget for the launching of a Department of Urban Services and the implementation of this program on a pilot basis in local communities.

Title VI Already mentioned as a goal of the Southern Field Service of the National CAtholic Conference for Interracial Justice, is the training of local leadership in working tools for the implementation of Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. In addition, the Conference will explore, with other organizations, methods of stepping up federal effectiveness in this area. The Conference believes that proper techniques under the authority of Title VI can have extensive and rapid effects on race relations in the United States, both in public life and, incidentally, in those private institutional complexes which get direct or indirect federal aid.

Thomas H. Gibbons, Jr. / Director of Employment Services

"The heads of the various denominations involved in Project Equality of Metropolitan Detroit are writing to the pastors of their respective churches asking that we give a concerted witness at this point.... Let us witness together our faith that God is involved in all of this. Let us stand with courage for the equality of opportunity and rights for every human being."

Dwight E. Loder, Resident Bishop
The Michigan Area of the Methodist Church

MICHIGAN METHODISTS IMPLEMENT PROJECT EQUALITY

On March 31st the Detroit Conference of the Methodist Church began implementation of PROJECT EQUALITY, the nationwide interreligious equal employment opportunity program. In a letter to all pastors and administrators of agencies in the Detroit Conference, headed "Dear Colleagues," Bishop Dwight E. Loder announced that the Detroit Conference action was in keeping with the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and with the action of the (Methodist) General Conference of 1964. The Board of Christian Social Concerns was charged by the Detroit Annual Conference with the implementation of the program. The Rev. Mr. James W. Bristah is Executive Director of this Board. In a subsequent letter signed by Rev. Bristah and Mr. J. Russell Bright, Chairman of the Board of Christian Social Concerns, all pastors of the Detroit Conference were requested to read a statement to their congregations of the "moral evil of employment discrimination." The PROJECT EQUALITY program will be implemented through the offices of Project Equality of Metropolitan Detroit, an interreligiously supported, non-profit corporation. Mr. Launbural Spriggs is Director of these offices and acts as merit employment director for the participating religious denominations.

UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN EASTERN MICHIGAN LAUNCHES PROJECT EQUALITY

The Detroit Metropolitan Association of the United Church of Christ commenced implementation of the PROJECT EQUALITY program on April 7th. In a letter to all pastors and administrators of institutions in the Detroit Association the Rev. Mr. Arlie E. Porter noted the action of the Board of Trustees of the Association calling upon each congregation or institution "to take the steps necessary ... to authorize your direct involvement." The Association had previously decided to administer its PROJECT EQUALITY program in conjunction with other participating Protestant, Orthodox, Jewish and Roman Catholic denominations through the offices of Project Equality of Metropolitan Detroit. Check-size commitment forms will be used by members of the association in paying by check for all goods and services purchased. These forms call on all suppliers to take affirmative actions "to support the Judeo-Christian tradition of human worth and the moral campaign of the church to establish equality of employment opportunity in our community."

JEWISH COMMUNITY COUNCIL OF METROPOLITAN DETROIT INITIATES PROJECT EQUALITY PROGRAM FOR 350 RELIGIOUS AND SECULAR AGENCIES

In a letter to Rabbis, Administrators and Presidents of Affiliated Organizations on March 31st, Dr. Samuel Krohn, President of the Jewish Community Council of Metropolitan Detroit proclaimed the start of the PROJECT EQUALITY program first announced last December. Indicating that the program would be coordinated for the Jewish community by Mr. Walter E. Klein, Director of the Jewish Community Council, Dr. Krohn stated that the program would be administered through the interfaith offices of Project Equality of Metropolitan Detroit. Approximately 350 individual Jewish agencies, secular and religious, are represented by the Detroit Community Council. Detroit's Jewish community thus becomes the first in the country to adopt the PROJECT EQUALITY program service of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice.

PROJECT EQUALITY GOES TO DATA PROCESSING TO SERVICE NATIONWIDE INTERRELIGIOUS NETWORK

Rev. Edward A. O'Donnell, Acting Merit Employment Director for the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of St. Louis, has announced that the forthcoming directory of participating PROJECT EQUALITY suppliers to be issued jointly in June by the Archdioceses of St. Louis and Detroit will be produced by automation. Utilizing the services of McDonnell Automation Center in St. Louis, a participating PROJECT EQUALITY supplier, the names and addresses of some 2,000 suppliers will be printed in a directory to be distributed as a "buyers guide" to all pastors and administrators of institutions in the two archdioceses. Subsequently, it will be possible to include the participating suppliers of other religious jurisdictions as they are compiled, and to issue both national and regional "buyers guides." The McDonnell equipment automatically prints an up-to-date directory of all participating suppliers, including any additions and deletions - "on request."

NATIONAL OFFICE STAFF FOR PROJECT EQUALITY IS INCREASED

Miss Consuelo Rodriguez has joined the staff of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. Before coming to the Conference's Chicago offices, Miss Rodriguez was secretary to Rev. James J. Sheehan, Executive Secretary of the Archbishop's Committee on Human Relations of the Archdiocese of Detroit. In this capacity Miss Rodriguez was responsible for coordination of the PROJECT EQUALITY program initiated in the Detroit Archdiocese one year ago. In Chicago she will assist Miss LaVerne Hickey who is program coordinator in the national office. She will also be engaged in the work of the Conference's Department of Affiliate Services.

"Our commitment to PROJECT EQUALITY, essentially, is a reflection of the stated and demonstrated positions of Jewish religious and organizational leadership. Economic handicaps resulting from discrimination in employment based upon race, religion or color, must be eliminated; such discrimination is not only legally wrong under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, but represents an intolerable moral injustice."

Dr. Samuel Krohn, President
Jewish Community Council of Metropolitan Detroit

PROJECT EQUALITY COORDINATOR APPOINTED FOR ROMAN CATHOLIC ARCHDIOCESE OF HARTFORD

Rev. Robert D. McGrath has been appointed Chairman of the Archbishop's Committee on Human Rights for the Archdiocese of Hartford. In this position Father McGrath will be responsible for coordination of the PROJECT EQUALITY program initiated in the East by Archbishop Henry J. O'Brien in November 1965. Previously the program has been coordinated from New Haven, Conn. under Bishop-Elect Peter L. Gerety. It is now expected that the PROJECT EQUALITY offices will be moved to Hartford, Conn. where Father McGrath is also pastor of St. Michael's parish.

"Project Equality is an Inter-Faith program providing the methods, tools, techniques and administrative procedures to churches so they may lend their moral suasion and economic power to achievement of equal employment opportunity for all citizens. It recognizes the obligation of the church to act in accord with its teachings..."

"We live in a world of gross human inequalities. It is our reponsibility as a church to make clear our belief that all men are equal before God, wherever and whenever this witness is meaningful. WEEKLY NEWS DIGEST OF APRIL 4, 1966

UNEMPLOYMENT DEADLY

Prolonged unemployment destroys the fabric of a man's life. There is no regular activity to fill his waking hours, no routine to anchor his existence. Time becomes his worst enemy, and the monotony of long hours with nothing to do robs him of incentive to pursue constructive goals. Idleness is demoralizing; social contacts diminish, self-improvement often appears useless, and the confidence to carry on evaporates. Prolonged unemployment may also involve loss of skill and erode a man's motivation to become self-supporting again.

A job is a minimum requirement for meaningful participation in society for a man who is head of a household, at least until he reaches retirement age. A man who cannot lay claim to a job knows that he is considered useless -- a failure in a society that traditionally measures success in terms of occupational achievement.

The tendency of the unemployed man to withdraw from social life may affect his civic participation and result in a loosening of his community ties. People with erratic work histories have much lower social participation than those with orderly work histories, as reflected in family ties, friendships, and membership in formal and informal organizations. Even when families remain intact, lengthy unemployment cuts down their particpation in community life, if only because they lack the money needed to participate in activities outside the home. There is at least a suggestion in a recent Census study that, among comparable groups, the unemployed are less likely to go to the polls. Unemployment may, then, be related also to a lessening in civic participation.

Your Excellency:

We are sending you the enclosed copy of THE CONTINUING CRISIS as an aid in understanding one changing aspect of race relations in the South.

There is a present possibility of racial violence in the South which should cause the greatest concern to all religious leaders. The frustration of Negroes in the South has been obvious since last year, long before the Mississippi March, and many human relations specialists feel that reaction may accelerate unless action is taken by concerned leaders in every locality and by federal officials.

In the short range, there will probably be the need for mediation, for trained and dedicated people to act as communications bridges.

In the long run, the involvement of all churchmen is essential in programs which aid Negroes to reach the goals outlined in the laws passed to aid their advancement and safety, but so broadly disregarded in practice by officials and citizens in Southern states.

The need for staffed and funded programs to assure equal rights and opportunities in all institutions in our society has never been greater. Too many have trusted that the national consensus represented in laws would automatically solve centuries of contrary practices.

Asking Your Excellency's blessing, I am

Respectfully yours,

John P. Sisson

REST IN PEACE

Raymond M. Hilliard

July 4, 1966

Director of the Cook County Department of Public Aid and Chairman of the Board of Directors of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice.

THE EVOLVING SNCC POSITION

The Selma Inter-religious Project is a joint effort of over a dozen organizations and denominations to continue the relationship established between these groups and the people of Selma and Black Belt Alabama. Four groups that act as national sponsors are: The Commission on Religion and Race of the National Council of Churches of Christ. The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, The Synagogue Council of America and The Unitarian - Universalist Association.

In a recent edition of their newsletter, edited by Rev. Francis X. Walter, Director of the Project an article appeared reviewing the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee position.

In the words of Rev. Walter.....The position of SNCC is far from apparent. But that is because it is alive and growing. White Alabamians, and white folks elsewhere, have been quick to read "racism" into the SNCC position and just as quick to denounce this horror. This sensitivity to racism has been an undiscovered talent for many up until the black Mr. Carmichael entered the evening news and the pages of Time. This seems to be a time to listen, especially for white people. If one listens one is forced to rethink old standbys like "racism" "integration" and "power."

Now it is said SNCC is firing its white volunteers. It is said again that they are all going voluntarily to Appalachia to begin the Movement among poor whites something a lot of people, remembering the old days of Popularism, have been dreaming about. Depending on the motives, feelings, and prejudices of SNCC-dom this could be called racism. Sure. But then we listen:

Reporter: Is desegregation as a goal out...? Miss Ruby Robinson, Executive Secretary. ".....Any talk about integration has always been initiated by the black community. After we initiated that action, we were beaten and jailed, and we went through a period of suffering. After this period of suffering, we were redeemed. Redemption was being allowed to sit next to people like Jim Clark. If there is to be true integration...white people in this country have to initiate (it). That is not our problem to initiate it any more...and what we need is black power."

If SNCC could trigger a Movement among poor whites in the South it would be strange and wonderful, but would it be racism? And sure, some SNCC folk are black nationalists but then I still manage to belong to a church full of white nationalists.

The June 4 issue of "The New Republic" carried a review by Lewis Yablonsky of The Uncommitted: Alienated Youth in American Society, by Kenneth Keniston. Keniston writes of 36 Harvard upperclass youth. The reviewer, out of his experience, sees similarities with lowerclass gang structured kids. But one also sees similarities with the SNCC posture. And I must honestly add that I see myself in these cases alienated, caught between the world and the Kingdom of God, a perfectly orthodox Christian way of "Telling it like it is."

We are told that among the alienated upperclass youth "the nonsense of the prevailing order" is a credo. "They are philosophers with hammers; their favorite theoretical occupation is destruction, reduction, pointing out inconsistencies, chicaneries, hypocrisies, and rationalizations whether in others or themselves." Keniston in attempting to explain that his 36 have no constructive program says, "(what unifies them is) rejection not only of selected visible aspects of American society, but of the basic assumption and values of traditional American culture as a whole." Well that's SNCC, but Christians and Jews can feel at home in that too.

It is said that alienation in part stems from the modern phenomena of "rapid social change, without any real control placed on its direction or intensity." Alienated folk are saying, we demand to know where we have been and where we are going. Yesterday's solutions are suspect. The present alone has meaning new wine and new skins only please.

So it makes sense to knock "integration" if one's approach to any concept of yesterday is in the form of an expose. "Integration" - buying off the black man like always. "Integration" - getting a little bread for a lot of sweat. "Integration" - the black man doing something for the white man like always. "Integration" - use of facilities one can't afford. These are things worth hearing. On the other hand, destructive analysis, and symptoms of withdrawing have their drawbacks and dangers in a movement effecting broad social change.

Bayard Rustin said, "The future of the Negro struggle depends on whether the contradictions of this society can be resolved by a co-alition of progressive forces which becomes the effective political majority in the United States."

Parish Programs

Project Commitment is a program approved and conducted by Archbishop John F. Dearden in the Archdiocese of Detroit. Project Commitment is an eight-session program of parish education in grass roots level race relations.

15 to 25 Catholic laymen are selected from each parish to be trained by the planning committee. They are selected because as neighbor, parishioner and community leader they have a special ability to influence others. They are asked to decide whether their influence shall be used toward bringing together all the people of God, or not.

The meetings provide facts, analyses and interpretations of such topics as the history of race relations, Detroit today, employment, education and housing. They are followed by sessions on the role of government, neighborhood self-help and parish responsibility.

A handbook on "how-to-do-it" can be obtained from Mr. Joseph L. Hansknecht, Jr., Chairman of Project Commitment, c/o Archbishop's Committee on Human Relations, 305 Michigan Avenue, Detroit, Michigan, 48226.

The Department of Affiliate Services of the National Catholic Conference was created the first of this year to provide, on a more intensive basis, the type of service that local affiliates have indicated are needed by them. For reasons of limited staff this year is the first time the Conference has been able to devote full-time staff to this important responsibility.

Department of Affiliate Services

Conference program in this area will take three basic forms: 1) Intensive Training Sessions for staffed Councils. Such meetings would provide for staffed organizations to meet for one or two days to think through current problems in the movement, changes in the church and the significance of both major areas for local program. 2) The development of additional staffed Councils; and 3) Regional Development and Training Sessions for growing Councils. This type of service would combine program development with a type of training experience to enable growing Councils to meet and overcome problems restricting their growth in areas such as membership, program development, fund raising and organization.

This qualification of the right to private property the Church has emphasized by teaching that ownership is a stewardship that involves social responsibility. The property owner who wishes to sell in the open market and yet wishes to exclude members of a certain race, religion or national origin from the opportunity to buy, is using his property to the detriment of society. Human dignity and equality demand the right to change of residence and opportunity to buy according to the same reasonable standards for all. Color or creed is not a reasonable stand-

Survey of the Catholic
Negro Apostolate

Remarks of Auxiliary Bishop Harold R. Perry, S.V.D. of New Orleans to the 24th annual Serra International Convention.

"From the days of Bishop James A. Healy, first U.S. bishop of Negro blood who was head of the Portland, Maine diocese from 1875 to 1900 there have been 165 Negro priests in the U.S. Our figures do not include those who came to this country to visit or for studies. The reason why there are not more than 165 is answered by the facts which seem to indicate that for many years there was a policy of non-encouragement of Negro vocations in general and for a long time the Divine Word Seminary was the only seminary which welcomed Negro vocations. Today virtually all Catholic seminaries of the U.S. admit Negro vocations.

55,000 priests have come from the 50 million Catholics of the country. The emergence of 165 Negro priests from ranks of 750,000 Negro Catholics is not abnormal, considering the few high school opportunities for the Negro youth in early decades.

If you consider the social and economic condition of our Negro Catholics, the number is indeed high...Victims of prejudice and discrimination, Negro Catholics of both rural and slum areas have had a much harder struggle than any other minority group. The fact that this number should arise from their midst is a tribute to their sterling faith and generous spirit of sacrifice.

Today there are 165 Negro priests of whom 119 belong to religious communities and 45 to the diocesan clergy.

The Divine Word Missionaries, Benedictines and Josephites lead with 56, 17, 10 respectively. The greatest number of vocations comes from Louisiana with 35 native Negro priests. New York follows with 18 while the District of Columbia, Mississippi and New Jersey have 9 each. There were only 3 Negro priests ordained in 1966.

As a nation we began declaring that 'All men are created equal' We more practically read it, 'All men are created equal except Negroes.' If America continues to promote bigotry by protecting those who conspire to keep minorities from enjoying their civil rights guaranteed to them under the Consitution, then we must confess that Democracy has failed. It is my prayer today....that every American will...conquer prejudices by conscientiously obeying our God's institution and observing God's Commandment of love that,which above all,means justice toward all our fellowmen."

METROPOLITAN

HOUSING

The Chicago Catholic Interracial Council has been working, as a member of the Coordinating Council for Community Organizations sponsors of Dr. Martin Luther King's work in Chicago, to bring open housing to the minority groups of Chicago.

In recent months the papers of the nation have carried numerous stories of neighborhood demonstrations conducted by the Chicago Freedom Movement. Bogan, Gage Park, and the Belmont-Cragin areas of Chicago, mostly white Catholic in composition, were the scene of these marches which, in most cases, were marked by violent reaction on the part of residents.

After flares of temper, charges and counter charges civic, business, labor, religious and civil rights leaders joined in a "summit conference" convened by the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race. This conference of leaders has developed a far-reaching program toward the creation of a fair housing market in the entire Chicago metropolitan area.

The full text of the Report of the Subcommittee to the Conference on Fair Housing Convened by the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race can be obtained from the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice for .50¢ per copy.

Published January, March, May, July, September and November.....$2 per year.

Here is a summary of the content of this report which constitutes the agreement.

The participants in the conference committed themselves to some action which would constitute a program aimed at the immediate, practical and effective creation of a fair housing market in Chicago.

To the commitment made by the Chicago Commission on Human Relations, real estate brokers, the Chicago Real Estate Board, the Chicago Housing Authority, the Cook County Department of Public Aid, the Urban Renewal Program, the Cook County Council of Insured Savings Associations, the Chicago Mortgage Bankers Association and business leaders, the religious community, co-sponsors of the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race reaffirmed their commitment. The text of their commitment is as follows:

"The leaders of the organized religious communities in the metropolitan area have already expressed their commitment to the principle of open housing.

The Chicago Conference on Religion and Race, which is co-sponsored by the Catholic Archdiocese of Chicago, the Church Federation of Greater Chicago, the Chicago Board of Rabbis and the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, pledges its support to the program outlined and will enlist the full strength of its constituent bodies and their churches and synagogues in effecting equal access to housing in the metropolitan area of all people. They pledge to:

(1) Educate their membership on the moral necessity of an open and just community.

(2) Urge owners to sell or rent housing without racial restriction.

(3) Support local real estate offices and lending institutions in their cooperation with this program.

(4) Cooperate with and aid the establishment of responsible community organizations and support them in the implementation of these programs.

(5) Undertake to secure peaceful acceptance and welcome of Negro families prior to and at the time of their entrance into any community.

(6) Use their resources to help make housing available without racial discrimination.

(7) Establish, within 30 days, one or more housing centers, with the assistance of the real estate and housing industry and financial institutions, to provide information and help in finding suitable housing for minority families and to urge them to take advantage of new housing opportunities."

In addition to these pledges the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race was called upon, in the program submitted by the subcommittee, to initiate forthwith the formation of a separate, continuing body, sponsored by major leadership organizations in the Chicago area. This body would accept responsibility for the education and action programs necessary to achieve fair housing.

In keeping with this commission the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race has announced the formation of the Metropolitan Chicago Leadership Council for Open Housing. Its Chairman is Mr. James W. Cook, President of the Illinois Bell Telephone Company and among the representatives on its board is Mr. John McDermott, Executive Director of the Chicago CIC.

Housing

The Housing committee of the Human Rights Committee of the Diocese of Worcester, Mass. is working with an interfaith committee of the Greater Worcester Area in a followup campaign on a 1,200 signature "open letter" advertisement on fair-housing by requesting that persons who signed adopt members of a Negro family and actively assist them in procuring decent housing to fit their needs.....the housing committee of the CIC of Pittsburgh is conducting a revisit to homes in a housing code enforcement campaign. A new Pennsylvania law permits tenants to withhold rent until specific conditions are improved.

Education

"Better than anything I could have dreamed", said Dr. John O'Hara, Director of the Human Relations Institute of the University of Oklahoma, about the Traveling Workshop, a program of the Department of Educational Services of the National Catholic Conference. This evaluation is typical of those who were host to the 1966 Traveling Workshop this summer. Statistics for those who are interested tally thus: In 45 Centers visited there were: 14,000 participants - - 1,100 minority-group citizens, 3,200 lay leaders and teachers, 100 clergymen of all faiths, 9,540 religious sisters, and 60 brothers. The staff of the Traveling Workshop covered 50,000 miles.....300 4th, 5th and 6th graders and 120 adults attended this summer's continuation of the Cabrini Project sponsored last summer by the National Catholic Conference and the Chicago CIC. Co-directed by Sr. M. Maigread OSF and seen by her as an experiment to be of service to large teaching orders looking for "new roles" the project offered drama, art, music, social living, math, english, typing, shorthand, child psychology, sewing, Red Cross, and tutoring.....To follow a slogan "People before buildings" Archbishop John P. Cody, Archdiocese of Chicago, will open no new Catholic school buildings this year. Instead 4,500 lay teachers will begin receiving salaries roughly equivalent to the public school systems.....16 sisters of various congregations in the Diocese of Camden, N. J. met in September to discuss wholesale participation of sisters outside the normal sphere of operations for religious. Their chief concern is in the Neighborhood Apostolate in culturally and economically deprived sections of Camden. The program of this group will concern itself with education, research and intercommunity activities.....Fr. Edward Flahavan of the CIC of the Twin Cities is continuing an interfaith Project Summer anti-poverty program in the St. Paul area. The program with 69 certified teachers and 125 volunteers is conducting compensatory education, recreational, vocational and cultural activities in six centers and a public school in St. Paul.....40 educators brought togehter at Alverno College, Milwaukee to study problems of the disadvantaged child in order to make their schools more effective, indicated 10 proposals that must be achieved if prospective teachers are to be successful in inner city schools - - 1) specific preparation of prospective teachers of the socially disadvantaged by those who have experience in such areas and more in-service training of teachers already in disadvantaged areas; 2) encourage by means of open-housing the integration of the disadvantaged into the school system in order that the child can be educated to live in a free society; 3) more cooperation between schools and community recreation departments in regard to adult education so that the facilities may be used more effectively; 4) more utilization of specialized personnel; 5) greater sharing of information between public and private schools; 6) fully staffed elementary school libraries; 7) school should work for more rapport between home and school; 8) implementation of kindergarden for the four year old; 9) additional funds to complete education of children; 10) a curriculum sufficiently flexible to be able to adapt to classroom situations.... Sister Maura Coughlan, CSJ of St. Paul, Minn. has been appointed to the staff of the National Catholic Conference as the Associate Director of Educational Services. Sister Maura will join Sister Mary Peter SSND, Director of the Department in planning of future educational programs.

What Your Dollars
Have Accomplished:

A Three-Year Report

The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice owes a great deal of the credit for the success its programs have achieved to the annual dues paid by affiliated Councils and Commissions, and to the many individual donations over the years from persons around the country.

We recently discovered just how important these "Catholic Money" figures are in relation to our ability to secure foundation grants. The annual audits for 1963, 1964 and 1965 demonstrate that, over this three-year period, every $100.00 received in dues and donations has enabled the Conference to attract a further $189.00 from foundations.

This is a record to be proud of; but we still have a big job to do before the Conference can launch solid, realistic programs in new areas - - housing and urban affairs, medical care, pastoral services and build new dimensions into our current programs in education and employment.

When the Conference submits a proposal to any foundation for a project grant, this is the first question we're always asked: "What proportion of your income is provided by Catholics?" It's a basic and important standard, and it means what it appears to mean: the larger the percentage of Catholic dues and donations the greater are the Conference's chances of securing the foundation grants so necessary to full-scale projects.

Your dues and donations do a double job, really. First, the obvious one:they provide real aid in meeting current expenses (mounting all the time).Second, they help to boost that very important ratio of Catholic income to total income.

So we thank you, very sincerely, for the double-barreled support your dues and donations have provided. And we ask you to do everything you can to help us to inch that "Catholic Money" percentage steadily upward - - it's the vital index of the growth potential of the Conference.

Bishop Peter L. Gerety
on
"Black Power"

"Black Power" slogan is a 'cry of despair' from Negroes in the face of white indifference and hostility.....We white people tremble when we hear the extremist cry - - "Black Power". And yet the Negro in this country is faced constantly and on every side with what he sees as the White Power which has lashed him, held him down, humiliated him for all these many years.....

White Americans are quick to criticize Negroes when outbreaks of racial violence occur - and such excesses cannot be condoned - but whites too are guilty of habitual evasion and disobedience of laws on fair-housing fair-employment and other issues. This is one of the facts of (the Negro's) life and yet very few of the mass of people in this country seem to him to be disturbed by this deeply entrenched lawlessness of which he is the victim - - except himself."

The
John LaFarge Institute

The John LaFarge Institute is an interreligious conference center that continues the work of the late Jesuit priest and interracial pioneer for whom it is named.

In the words of James J. Gallagher, Executive Director, "It is not only possible but absolutely essential in this day and age to provide a place where Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, civil rights, business and other leaders of the country can get together to talk openly and frankly.

The institute's normal program calls for two major conferences a year. Typically, these are held for one or two days in a wood-paneled room on the second floor of the America magazine headquarters. While the main concern for its first year has been civil rights facilities are open to other groups related to inter-racial, religious affairs.
Fr. John LaFarge, who died November 1963, was editor of America and founder of the CIC movement.

The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice held its bi-annual meeting of the Board of Directors, August 28th at Georgetown University in Washington and elected the following Board personnel:

Appointments

The National Catholic Conference in August announced the appointment of Miss Margaret C. Roach to its program staff. Expansion of Conference programs and services, especially over the past 18 months, has brought about a corresponding need for an enlarged program staff. Miss Roach will analyze and evaluate current programs and study human relations projects proposed for Conference adoption. Since 1962, Miss Roach has been social action secretary for the National Council of Catholic Women. Previously, she had been assistant to the Executive Director of the Chicago CIC.....The CIC of Davenport, Iowa announced that September 1st Sister Mary Germaine Dermody of the Community of the Humility of Mary would become the full-time, salaried executive assistant of the Council. Your Excellency:

Because of a number of requests we are planning to reprint the 24-page amicus curiae brief in the Loving miscegenation case now before the U.S. Supreme Court, filed by sixteen Catholic ordinaries, NCCIJ and NCSAC.

If enough are ordered it will reduce the cost per copy to 35¢ (the first printing cost $2.71 per copy exclusive of postage). At the present order level the price is 65¢ each, and orders for an additional 200 will reduce it to 45¢. Certainly there will be that many.

We already have bishops' orders for 50 and for 200. Some of these will be distributed to Catholic lawyers; others might be distributed to clergy, libraries, convents, heads of diocesan organizations, leaders of other denominations, and so on.

It is unlikely that this brief will be printed again, so please let us have your order (preferably in multiples of 25) by Easter Monday, March 27.

Asking Your Excellency's blessings, I am

Respectfully yours,

John P. Sisson

National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice

JUNE 1967

KANSAS CITY CONVENTION TO DISCUSS CHURCH'S ROLE IN URBAN RACIAL CRISIS
August 17-20

The Church's role in the urban racial crisis will be examined by delegates to the August 1967 convention of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice.

"With its vast institutional complex and the clerical, religious and lay manpower involved, the Catholic Church represents a major force for social change in the city today," Mathew Ahmann, executive director said. "The CIC delegates will look at the Church's role and recommend priorities for action by the Church and her people."

The conference, scheduled for August 17-20, at Rockhurst College in Kansas City, Mo., will be co-hosted by the college, the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph and the Catholic Interracial Council of Kansas City.

Conference speakers will include Archbishop John F. Dearden of Detroit and president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops on "The Challenge to Change in the Urban Church;" Msgr. Daniel Cantwell, pastor of St. Clotilde Congregation, Chicago on "The City and the Mission of the Church;" Dr. George Wiley, Director of the Poverty/Rights Action Center, Washington, D. C. on "The Equal Rights of the Poor;" Rev. Henry Browne, president of the Stryckers Bay Community Council in New York on "Power and the Institutional Church." A fifth major presentation will be on the topic, "Crisis in Our Cities."

For maximum involvement of CIC delegates, background papers will be furnished all participants for their study prior to the opening of the convention and for their use in workgroup discussion and formulation of recommendations during the meeting. Background papers are being prepared in the areas of education, employment, housing, health, social welfare, legal services, and the special needs of the Spanish-speaking.

REGISTER NOW FOR THIS IMPORTANT CONFERENCE -- SEE PAGE 8 FOR DETAILS.

Richard A. Cloward and Frances Fox Piven of the Columbia University School of Social Work have been commissioned to prepare the paper on social welfare. Msgr. Thomas Reese, director of Catholic Social Services for the Diocese of Wilmington, Delaware will write a supplementary paper in this area for relation to the Catholic system of social service.

The editor of Integrated Education magazine, Meyer Weinberg, will prepare the background paper in the field of education. The housing paper will be written by Emil Seliga, director of the Department of Urban Services for the National Catholic Conference. The president of Clark University in Atlanta, Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, will write the employment background paper. Dr. Henderson was formerly professor of economics atFisk University.

Dr. Paul Cornely, head of the Public Health Department of Howard University's Medical School in Washington, D. C., is the author of the background paper on health. Mr. Joseph Rubio, editor of the Southwest Catholic Register, El Paso, Texas will detail the special needs of the Spanish-speaking in his background paper. Mr. Paul G. Chevigny, director of the Police Practices Project for the New York Civil Liberties Union, will prepare the paper on legal services.

NCCIJ Creates Urban Services Department

In announcing the creation of a new department of Urban Services and the appointment of Emil J. Seliga, Los Angeles savings and loan executive, to head the department, Mathew Ahmann, executive director of the Conference said: "We propose to undertake a comprehensive inquiry into existing problems and programs of urban affairs. From this we expect to offer a workable program for use on the local level of the church. Such a program would serve to implement the recent American Catholic Bishops' policy statement urging full freedom of the housing market to all minority groups. It would be aimed particularly at mobilizing a response from the man in the pew and at helping to shape the city of the future."

Emil Seliga, who heads the new department, has been in the savings and loan business since 1935. He has been president of Talman Federal Savings and Loan Association of Chicago and executive vice president of Great Western Savings and Loan Association of Los Angeles, both insitutions among the ten largest in the nation.

In addition, Mr. Seliga has had extensive personal involvement with civic affairs, serving on the Metropolitan Housing and Planning Council of Chicago, the Chicago Dwellings Association, Chicago's Community Conservation Board and the Community Relations Conference of Southern California. He is also founder and past president of the Catholic Human Relations Council of Los Angeles and serves on the Commission on the Church and Race of the Council of Churches of Southern California.

OEO Funds Alabama Co-Op

An Alabama farmers cooperative has received almost $400,000 in poverty funds against strong objections from the state's political powers. The Southwest Alabama Farmers Cooperative Association, operating in Dallas (Selma) Lowndes, Wilcox, Perry, Hale, Greene, Monroe Marengo, Choctaw and Sumter counties, proposed a demonstration project to develop the social and economic mechanism to provide the farmer with the option of remaining on the land.

CRAFTS FOR FREEDOM --that's what they call the handcrafted dolls, dresses, handbags, candles and other items produced by former Mississippi maids and sharecroppers, now members of the Poor People's Corporation.

The Poor People's Corporation provides financial and technical assistance to the 15 producer-cooperatives in Mississippi. Each co-op is owned, managed and operated by its workers. Co-ops purchase supplies and market their goods together with the help of the PPC and Liberty House, the marketing cooperative.

Co-op workers are former farm laborers, sharecroppers and domestics previously earned an average of $10 per week. They now strive together toward their goal of earning the national minimum wage. The cooperatives are their opportunity to achieve this goal and remain economically independent.

The co-ops need financial contributions for expansion, sales promotion and other program needs (checks made out to the Poor People's Technical Assistance Corp. will be tax deductible; exemption applied for); designers and new product ideas; new customers both wholesale and retail; people with skills to help train new co-ops in sewing, leathercraft, woodwork, candle-making, quilting and other skills; fabrics and remnants; industrial sewing machines; and publicity --

The Freedom Quilting Bee of Auburn, Ala., is another handcraft cooperative begun with a loan from the Episcopal Society's Jonathan Daniels Memorial Fund. The formation of the Freedom Quilting Bee was initiated by the Selma Interreligious Project (NCCIJ is a sponsoring organization). Stock quilts are $20 and $25 depending on size and complexity of design. Baby quilts are $12. King-size quilts and requests for specific colors and designs may be specially ordered. The cooperative also makes sunbonnets which sell for $3 and pot holders at $1. Clothing scraps from both sewing baskets and textile or garment factories are needed. Tax deductible donations may be made to the co-op's technical assistance fund. Quilt orders and contributions should be sent to the Alabama Council of Human Relations, Inc., Freedom Quilting Bee Fund, P.O. Box 1310, Auburn, Ala. 36830.

Project Equality is Two Years Old

This spring Project Equality had its second birthday -- it was in May, 1965 that the Archdiocese of St. Louis became the first judicatory in the nation to adopt the Conference's program for equal employment opportunity. The Archdiocese of Detroit followed a week later; in August the Archdiocese of San Antonio became the third participant.

These pilot programs were the first to make use of Project Equality's affirmative action plan for merit employment. They assumed the responsibility of: (1) insuring equal employment in all their own hiring; (2) requiring equal employment as a condition of sale in all general and contract purchasing.

Metropolitan Detroit became the first interreligious program in December, 1965; today interreligious teamwork is the outstanding characteristic of Project Equality nationally. There are now 85 participating judicatories: 48 Protestant, 14 Jewish, 2 Eastern Orthodox, 3 Unitarian-Universalist and 18 Roman Catholic. The program operates through ten local offices in nine states.

Six local offices have professional directors; two of them are members of the United Presbyterian Church, U.S.A. Mr. James J. McGuire, formerly associate director of the Conference's Southern Field Service in New Orleans, became director of the Tennessee Project Equality program in May.

To date, about 15,000 firms have pledged their cooperation with the program -- these range from two-man shops to corporations hiring as many as 100,000 persons.

Some "firsts" for 1967...

*First program in a Southern state -- Project Equality of Tennessee, launched in March; it now has Protestant, Jewish and Catholic participation.

*Largest program yet -- Minnesota Project Equality, launched in April, counts 27 judicatories.

*Denominational "first" -- three new judicatories are the first in their denominations to join Project Equality -- in Minnesota, the National Baptist State Convention; in Tennessee, the Board of World Missions of the Presbyterian Church, U.S.; in Connecticut, the A.M.E. Zion Church.

*New structure for Project Equality Council -- Until March, 1967 an informal advisory group, the Council is now the program-planning body for Project Equality. Its members will largely be delegates from local programs.

*National office expansion -- to provide adequate servicing for this growing network, these positions will be filled for the Chicago office in 1967: deputy director, three regional field directors, assistant director for administration.

A look ahead... Thomas H. Gibbons, Jr., Conference director of employment services and national director for Project Equality, expects to see five new offices opened during the rest of 1967, and a total of 30 regional offices -- serving more than 300 judicatories -- in operation by the end of 1968.

NCCIJ and Weston

In a resolution passed at its last meeting, the Board of Directors of NCCIJ urged Congress to withhold decision on location and funding of the proposed Atomic Energy Commission accelerator facility in Weston, Ill. until a fact-finding committee of the Congress holds public hearings in the Chicago metropolitan area.

"A grave doubt exists whether the metropolitan area of Chicago in which the Weston site is located and the State of Illinois have an effective affirmative action program for equality of housing, employment and education consistent with national policies," the Board declared. A fact-finding committee should "determine whether the State of Illinois and the metropolitan area of Chicago have in fact or will adopt an effective affirmative action program, including a strong State Fair Housing Law, to implement internal policy." Civil rights organizations in Chicago, including the Chicago CIC, have protested location of the facility in Illinois unless the state legislature provides a strong fair housing law. Richard J. Walsh, then president of the Chicago CIC, wired Democrats and Republicans in the State Legislature, asking them to join together in a bi-partisan commitment to pass effective state fair housing legislation. Walsh appealed to them to take the issue out of partisan politics not only because it is a matter of human justice but also because it is the only effective way to safeguard for Illinois the AEC proposed Weston reactor project.

The Loving Case

The National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice joined by 16 Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops, at the invitation of Bishop Russell of Richmond, filed an amicus brief in the Loving miscegenation case. The case now pending originated in Virginia four years ago. The brief stressed especially that the Virginia anti-miscegenation law is a violation of free exercise of religion. The Conference also concurred in the major arguments of the Loving's own Counsel from the American Civil Liberties Union. Rev. William Lewers, Professor of Law, University of Notre Dame Law School, is serving as Counsel for the Conference in the Loving case. Father Lewers indicated that to his knowledge this was the first time any number of bishops joined in a social justice issue before the courts. The archbishops and bishops joining in the brief were: Bishop John J. Russell of Richmond; Lawrence Cardinal Shehan of Baltimore; Archbishop Paul J. Hallinan of Atlanta; Archbishop Philip M. Hannan of New Orleans; Archbishop Robert E. Lucey of San Antonio; Bishop Joseph B. Brunini, Apostolic Administrator of Natchez-Jackson; Bishop Lawrence M. DeFalco of Amarillo; Bishop Joseph A. Durick, Apostolic Administrator of Nashville; Bishop Thomas K. Gorman of Dallas-Fort Worth; Bishop Joseph H. Hodges of Wheeling; Bishop John L. Morkovsky, Apostolic Administrator of Galveston-Houston; Bishop Victor J. Reed of Oklahoma City-Tulsa; Bishop L. J. Reicher of Austin, Tex.; Bishop Thomas Tschoepe of San Angelo, Tex.; Bishop Ernest L. Unterkoefler of Charleston, and Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh.

The National Catholic Social Action Conference also joined in the filing of the brief. Tidewater CIC issued the following statement: "We want to extend our support and praise to the sixteen bishops who filed a "friend of the court" brief in support of the Lovings, challenging the Virginia (and in effect all other) anti-miscegenation laws. They stated: 'Since the statues make race the test of whether a man and woman may marry, they therefore bar those who cannot meet this racial test from one of the chief lawful rights in marriage -- the right of having children.'" Reprints of the brief are available from Southern Field Service, 8017 Palm St., New Orleans, La. 70125 (Cost - 50¢).

Housing

The Archdiocese of Detroit recently received a $203,000 demonstration grant from the Department of Housing and Urban Development to construct 17 low cost housing units which will be sold to residents of the neighborhood in which they will be built. The Positive Neighborhood Action Committee will act as sales agent for the experimental houses, apartments and townhouses. Construction will begin this summer. Phoenix Homes will offer units of three bedrooms-and-up for as little as $6800 plus land costs averaging about $1,000. If the experiment is successful, the Archdiocese is prepared to build 500 more units. Archbishop Dearden speaking at a press conference announcing the grant said: "Cooperation of many -- of those living in the project area, of the federal and city government, of private industry, of labor and of others -- has made this demonstration possible."

Bishop Ackerman and the CIC of Covington joined other groups in support of the Good Neighbor-Card campaign in northern Kentucky. In a pastoral letter read on Fair Housing, Sunday the Bishop declared: "...The perpetuation of a practice which results in confining to ghettoes those whom some have decided are unworthy of a proper place in society, is evil and must be recognized and condemend as such by all who call themselves Christians..." Other CICs active in good neighbor pledge campaigns and other educational efforts to secure support for fair housing are the CIC of Hartford which cooperated with the Hartford Times and Hartford Human Relations Commission in their open occupancy coupon project (I Support Open Housing), the Diocese of Miami Human Relations Board in cooperation with the Community Relations Board of Dade County and the Inter-Faith Agency for Social Justice, the Tacoma CIC working with the Citizens of Pierce County and Tacoma Committee for Fair Housing, the CIC of Montgomery County, Md. which joined in sponsorship of Fair Housing Month, the CIC of Toledo which gathered thousands of signatures for open housing. CIC of Pittsburgh testified at hearings on a city ordinance to expand anti-discrimination laws to include full coverage of housing sales and rentals. The new law, passed unanimously, covers 100% of the residential sale and rental market. CIC of Davenport submitted an open housing ordinance to the Davenport Human Relations Council. The CIC was supported by the Davenport Ministerial Association andthe Commission on Religion and Race of the Council of Churches. Support for pending state legislation for fair housing was provided by the CIC of Chicago and the CIC of Davenport and the Catholic Council on Community Relations of Philadelphia...CIC of Waterbury successfuly sponsored a rent receivership ordinance throughthe Board of Alderman.CIC of Prince George County,Md. supported efforts of ACCESS (Action Coordinating Committee to End Segregation in the Suburbs) to open up apartment rentals in the suburbs, particularly by pressing the Pentagon to instruct base commanders inthe Washington, D. C. area to declare segregated apartmenthouses off limits to military personnel.John XXIII Council on Human Relations of Portland, Oregon took a public stand in support of a proposed public housing project for low income families in testimony before the City Council..SanFrancisco Archdiocesan Social Justice Commission supported the brief filed by the California attorney general asking the U.S. Supreme Court to rule infavorof California fairhousing laws...A Pittsburgh CIC member of the Greater Pittsburgh Fair Housing Movement(CIC of Pittsburgh is a participating organization) met with officials of one ofthe major gas companies concerning their policies on gas deposits.

The Cooperative Association will provide for cooperative purchase of seed and fertilizer, gas and oil, insecticides and tractor parts and for farm loans at low interest rates, as well as economic development through credit unions, insurance programs and farm equipment sales. The cooperative will also move into social services for the 800 farmer families, such as self-help housing and cooperative day care. Opposition to the SWAFCA grant is reminiscent of the Child Development Group of Mississippi situation. In the cases of both SWAFCA and CDGM, NCCIJ joined with other organizations in the Citizens Crusade Against Poverty, to urge funding by the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Dear Mr. Stanfield:

On behalf of Donald Kraybill, Darrell Baer, and myself, I would like to express appreciation to you for the opportunity to visit with you in your office several weeks ago representing Mennonite Voluntary Service. It was very interesting for us to sit down and chat with you to discover if there are ways our organization can work with you.

It is certainly evident that there are many needs in the Atlanta and surrounding areas in the State of Georgia and other southern states. We are not sure exactly how our program might work with some of these needs. This was, however, a good beginning and a good insight for us.

Should you want to get in touch with someone from our organization locally, feel free to get in touch with Mr. Darrell Baer, 690 Bolton Road, Atlanta, Georgia.

Thank you again for taking time from your busy schedule to chat with us. Best wishes for your organization in 1968.

Sincerely,

Dear Dr. Spiegel:

I read the enclosed story in the NEW YORK TIMES with a great deal of interest. Your study on the 218 racial disturbances occurring in 1967 will no doubt prove valuable, and I should very much like to have a copy.

One serious flaw that I see is in going only to police chiefs for corroboration of newspaper accounts (which in themselves might be misleading). The police chiefs, of course, have a vested interest in the operations of their departments and are responsible to currently elected officials. This is not to categorically condemn the operation of police departments; but in my experience, especially in the South the policeman's report of what happened is often at great variance with what other observers see.

Might I suggest that, at least on a sampling basis, you solicit the same kind of information from state and city councils on human relations, state commissions on human relations, state advisory committees to the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, from U.S. Civil Rights Commission staff itself, from the American Civil Liberties Union, and in the South from Southern Regional Council.

Another problem to be examined is the attitude of Negroes (and poor whites) toward the police department. Their attitudes, and the attitudes of policemen in dealing with the poor, in my opinion set up situations of conflict.

Sincerely yours,

John P. Sisson

Only 5 of 218 Racial Outbreaks Laid to Agitators

By DAVID BURNHAM

An expert on violence and rioting in the United States said here yesterday that only five of the 218 racial disturbances that occurred in the country in 1967 appeared to have been precipitated by agitators.

He did not disclose where the five incidents caused by agitators took place.

Dr. John Spiegel, director of the Lemberg Study of Violence at Brandeis University, said that friction between the police and Negro slum dwellers appeared to have started about 30 per cent of the disturbances.

Dr. Spiegel, a psychiatrist whose center has been studying riots for the last 18 months, discussed their causes during a session on riots and urban mass violence at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Dr. Spiegel said his survey indicated that the 218 disturbances occurred in 184 communities in 1967. He predicted there would be more in 1968.

"I expect we will have more urban violence next year and that this kind of violence will continue until the country learns how to deal with the crisis of racism," he said.

Dr. Spiegel defined the crisis as the "failure of the white people to understand that black people are to be treated as human beings."

The psychiatrist said that 159 of the 218 disturbances could be classified as what he called "real riots."

Discussing the immediate causes of riots, Dr. Spiegel said that confrontations between the police and the community appeared to be the "major precipitating event."

He emphasized, however, that only about 2 per cent of these confrontations appeared to involve police brutality and that the vast majority of them involved normal police practices, including the arrests for criminal offenses.

Dr. Spiegel said that though most riots were sparked by an incident on the streets, a large number of "precipitating events" occurred in such places as schools, parks or at dances.

The psychiatrist said 34 of the 184 communities that had racial disturbances in 1967 had more than one of them. He said four communities had two disturbances, three communities had three and four communities had from four to eight disturbances.

Dr. Spiegel said his survey had been based on an examination of accounts of disturbances published in newspapers. He said the accuracy of these accounts had been checked by writing the police chiefs in the various communities and weighing their responses.

POVERTY

ORIGINS OF MAN

POPE JOHN XXIII

"It is not enough to publicize a social doctrine; it must be translated into action. This is particularly true of Christian social doctrine, whose LIGHT IS TRUTH, whose objective is JUSTICE AND WHOSE DRIVING FORCE IS LOVE."

HOW

There will be a concentration on a study of what man is and what kind of world he is trying to live in. What specific issues challenge his humanity or create conflicts, inter-religious tensions, intra-cultural problems in the context of the origins of man. College credit may be given by the college where the workshop is being sponsored.

RESULTS

These activities and experiences should result in greater understanding of youth, and adults, especially regarding social and psychological backgrounds. Sharing in workshop experiences can foster greater understanding of the community and the social milieu of one's apostolate.

WHEN

The workshop will be held for one, three, or five days. Lectures will be enriched by dialog and tours related to the local civic community. Local citizens will be guest lecturers and group leaders during the workshop.

MATERIALS

A film library, paperback collection and special printed materials on inter-group relations will be a part of the workshop. This is a "college faculty on wheels" for the sisters will drive from one part of the country to another where host centers are located. The sisters are from different orders and from different areas of fifty states.

"With humility and regret, we Catholics must acknowledge that we have been all-too slow in the correction of our shortcomings, although, in the light of the experiences of our forefathers, we should have been particularly sensitive to the unjust inequalities suffered by other groups. For this reason, we have a special obligation to place ourselves in the forefront of movements to remove the injustices and discriminations which still remain."

INFORMATION ON PROJECT EQUALITY

WHAT IS IT?

Project Equality is a program service of the National Catholic Conference on Interracial Justice to utilize the hiring and purchasing power of Catholic Church institutions to end employment discrimination in both these institutions and all those firms which supply them with goods and services.

WHY IS IT NEEDED?

Today discrimination has unfortunately become part of the American way of life due to a defect in our education. Therefore, persons and firms practice as much unconscious discrimination as they do of the more overt type. For this reason affirmative actions are required to eliminate discrimination particularly in employment practices.

WHAT ARE AFFIRMATIVE ACTIONS?

Affirmative actions are positive steps taken by management to adopt an equal employment opportunity policy and to implement it in their organization. Examples of affirmative actions are:

1) Contacting sources of minority group employees to fill job openings,

2) Communicating the policy of Equal Employment Opportunity to all management echelon, all employees, and particularly to the personnel department,

3) Contacting current sources of new employees and advising them of the firm policy of hiring on a non-discriminatory basis.

HOW MANY AFFIRMATIVE ACTIONS ARE THERE?

Basically there are twenty-five affirmative actions, but these are effective in a sequence of time, so that other affirmative actions replace these and are added to them as the total employment picture in the country or a particular area changes.

WHAT AREAS WILL THE PROJECT EQUALITY PROGRAM COVER?

Project Equality is designed to overcome employment discrimination in three specific areas:

1) general manufacturing and services,
2) construction, and
3) insurance, banking and real estate, as well as surveying the employment practices of church institutions themselves and eliminating any discrimination.

HOW WILL THE PROJECT EQUALITY PROGRAM WORK?

Project Equality is an educative program, and as such it will offer technical assistance to Catholic Church institutions and those firms supplying them with goods and services. This will be done by surveying the employment practices and the personnel rosters of these firms and institutions and compiling progress reports. Evaluations of these reports plus compliance reviews of the institutions will determine what affirmative actions are required to eliminate the discriminatory practices encountered.

HOW WILL THE PROGRAM BE SUPERVISED AND DIRECTED?

The Archbishop has charged the Commission on Human Rights with the responsibility for implementing the program. Eventually a merit employment director will be appointed to conduct compliance reviews of employment practices, and to evaluate the efforts being made to provide equal employment opportunity on the part of firms doing business with Archdiocesan institutions.

IS PROJECT EQUALITY ACTUALLY A CHURCH BOYCOTT?

Project Equality is not a boycott, but rather an affirmative use of the hiring and purchasing power of Catholic institutions to end employment discrimination. Thus these institutions will evaluate bids from suppliers not only on the basis of price, quality and service, but also on the equal employment opportunity policy and practices of the suppliers. Those institutions which provide equality in employment opportunity will be favored over those which do not.

IF SOME FIRMS ARE FAVORED OVER OTHERS, ISN'T THIS A SANCTION OR BOYCOTT?

Catholic Church institutions have a responsibility to spend their funds in a moral manner. If a company received a contract award, because it provided a superior combination of price, quality and service, we would not say that the firm which did not receive this award had been boycotted or suffered from economic sanction. Similarly a preference in purchasing for those firms which offer true equal employment opportunity is also not necessarily a boycott or sanction in regard to other firms.

HAS THIS TYPE OF PROGRAM BEEN EMPLOYED SUCCESSFULLY ELSEWHERE?

The affirmative action concept was first utilized by the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity created by executive order of President John F. Kennedy in April, 1961. Since then it has provided the most effective means of opening job opportunities to Negroes and members of other minority groups.

WHAT IS THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN PROJECT EQUALITY AND POSSIBLE STATE FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE PROGRAMS?

Project Equality is an educative approach based on a contractual relationship, whereas fair employment practice laws are a punitive approach based on a legal relationship. In the first approach the employer is required to act affirmatively as a pre-condition to entering into a contract. In the latter approach the employer is proscribed from acting negatively under threat of legal sanction.

WHAT OTHER CATHOLIC DIOCESES HAVE ENLISTED SIMILAR PROJECT EQUALITY PROGRAMS?

Several other Catholic dioceses have adopted the Project Equality program service being offered by the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. Many others have it under consideration as do religious orders which operate in many states. The program has been initiated nationally in the St. Louis Archdiocese. Eventually Project Equality will be offered to nearly 1000 Catholic jurisdictions in the United States. For further information contact Mr. Mathew Ahmann or Mr. Thomas Gibbons, Jr.

Thomas H. Gibbons, Jr. / Director of Employment Services

Dear Friend:

Last September the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice announced a new program service for bishops and religious superiors in the field of merit employment. This program service is designed to promote and encourage merit employment practices at the expense of discriminatory practices by all those firms which do business with Roman Catholic Church institutions.

The preparation and execution of this program service was charged to the newly created Employment Services Department of the Conference. The preparatory phase will be completed in the coming month, and in February this new service will be ready for introduction into an initial three dioceses. Later it will be available to other dioceses and religious communities in increasing numbers.

We have named this new program service of the Conference - PROJECT EQUALITY - and hope it will be only one of many fitting responses to Mr. Whitney M. Young's recent book, To Be Equal. Attached is an outline of PROJECT EQUALITY. However, its application will vary according to the different circumstances applicable in a particular diocese or religious community. Your comments on the program service described will be appreciated.

This bulletin has been designed for two purposes: First, to provide those participating in PROJECT EQUALITY with general employment information, facts concerning merit employment, and specific aids in making their own efforts more effective; and second, to inform both participants and interested observers as to the progress of PROJECT EQUALITY through the various Roman Catholic dioceses and religious communities in our country.

We invite you to send us the names and addresses of any persons or organizations whom you believe would be interested in receiving this bulletin in the future.

Sincerely,

Thomas H. Gibbons, Jr.

"All qualified applicants will receive consideration for employment without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin."
President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity

PROJECT EQUALITY

A Program to Utilize the Purchasing Power of Catholic Institutions to Achieve Equality in Employment Opportunity

The largest purchaser of goods and services in the United States is the federal government. In March 1961, President Kennedy issued Executive Order No. 10925, which created the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. This committee, under the Executive Order, had a two-fold purpose -- (1) to base the entire employment practices, including hiring, transfer and promotion, of the federal government and all of its agencies on merit alone, and to eliminate discrimination based on race, creed, color or national origin; and, (2) to utilize the tremendous purchasing power of the federal government to bring about nondiscriminatory merit employment practices in all those firms and businesses which did, or wished to do business with the federal government.

This was followed two years later by a second Executive Order, No. 11114, which specified that, where federal funds were being used in private construction projects, all businesses engaged in those projects would also be required to utilize nondiscriminatory merit employment practices. The federal government recognized that it was the moral and constitutional right of every citizen to seek employment and to be employed based on his ability, and that discrimination because of his race, his creed, his color, or his country of origin, denied his natural and constitutional right of equal opportunity.

Aside from the federal government, probably the second largest purchaser of goods and services in the United States is the Roman Catholic Church, through its dioceses, archdioceses, and religious orders. The program, Project Equality, developed by the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, provides the methods, tools, techniques and administrative procedures, so that church institutions may lend their moral suasion and economic influence to the moral cause of achieving equal employment opportunity for all of our citizens. It recognizes the moral obligation of the church to act in accordance with its teachings. Religion preached on Sunday must be practiced and applied to our economic endeavors during the rest of the week.

Therefore, to complement "Federal Money for Justice," the Conference proposes to add "Church Money for Justice."

The procedures to be utilized under the Conference program have been adopted from those proven in three and one-half years experience of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. Thus the program is a positive and affirmative one, and is properly expressed in words such as, "encourage," "assist," "promote," and "educate." The program, in its direction and in its emphasis, is not negative ... is not punitive ... is not restrictive. It does add a new enlightened dimension to daily affairs in keeping with the spirit of aggiornamento, both within the church and within society in the United States and in the world.

It is a reaffirmation of the Church's role in bringing Christ's teaching of justice and charity to all mankind.

"For, if a man becomes conscious of his rights, he must become equally aware of his duties. Thus he who possesses certain rights has likewise the duty to claim those rights as marks of his dignity, while all others have the obligation to acknowledge those rights and respect them."

John XXIII
Pacem in Terris

Where the Conference is invited to assist a diocese or religious community in encouraging the promotion of equal opportunity, it will proceed along the general steps outlined below:

1. A statement of policy regarding merit employment and equal opportunity will be promulgated by the bishop or religious superior, both internally to all members of their own diocese or community, and also externally to the civic community of which they are a part. Naturally, the employment practices of the various diocesan institutions, themselves, would be reviewed at this time.

2. A merit employment director will be appointed by the bishop or religious superior to assist him in administering the program. This director will be instructed and trained in the requisite techniques by the Employment Services Department of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice. These are the specific techniques which have been developed and proved effective in the federal program. The director will be selected on the basis of his ability to apply these techniques through good human relations, and also his capability as an efficient administrator.

   After providing the initial training, the Employment Services Department of the Conference will continue to act in an advisory and consultant capacity, to coordinate work of the various merit employment directors, to provide regular information, and to hold an annual refresher course and workshops at the yearly convention of the National Catholic Conference.

3. The bishop or religious superior will inform by letter all those companies with which the diocese or religious order does business, of the moral commitment and consequent requirement of practice of merit employment and equal opportunity in all of their future business transactions. It will specify, furthermore, that where church money is spent, selection of a supplier will be based, not only on the material considerations of price, quality and ability to deliver, but also on the moral consideration of the merit employment policy of the supplier.

4. To assist the diocese or religious community in determining the merit employment practices of those firms with which they deal, the practices of such firms themselves, as interpreted in affirmative actions, will be the criteria. A list of such affirmative actions will be supplied in the letter of policy statement. Examples of such affirmative actions are:

   a. Sending letters to all employment services of the company advising that they will hire on the basis of merit alone, and therefore wish to interview qualified candidates regardless of race, creed, or color; and,

   b. Contacting sources of minority group workers when they have imminent job openings.

   Those firms which are already utilizing such affirmative practices, and those firms which agree to implement those practices will be asked to notify the bishop or religious superior to that effect.

5. As proof of good faith, these companies subsequently will be asked to return to the diocese or religious order a form which will classify their working force by race, and will break it down according to job category ... from executive through professional and technical, down to supervisory, clerical, skilled and unskilled. Furthermore, a similar report will be required periodically. These forms will provide the basis for the work of the merit employment director, and will assist him in keeping the bishop or religious superior informed as to the progress of the positive merit employment programs of these companies. They will also furnish a basis for evaluation of the effectiveness of the diocesan equal employment opportunity policy in succeeding years.

6. Every occasion will be utilized to give laudatory publicity to those firms which have outstanding merit employment policies and practices; in particular, announcements of the awards of new contracts will be made, indicating the merit employment practices of the company as a contributing factor.

The program will work in conjunction with other organizations involved in the equal employment field wherever possible. This will first of all avoid inefficiency and duplication. For example, where a firm is already submitting a similar breakdown based on the adoption of similar affirmative action practices to a federal, state, county or local jurisdition, a copy of such report may be sent to the diocese or religious order.

Furthermore, one of the functions of a merit employment director will be to furnish sources of minority group workers in his community, so as to be able to provide this information to those firms cooperating in the program. This means the director will establish contact with civil rights groups as well as businessmen in the minority group communities.

The experience of the federal government, after three and one-half years of its program, indicates that the business community, particularly the enlightened business community, is primarily concerned not with the question of whether or not they will be merit employers, but rather how to go about implementation of a merit employment policy. Furthermore, in those firms not so concerned at this time, the factors of unconscious discrimination or inertia in implementing such a program are primary, and these factors will respond most readily to a merit employment policy on the part of Catholic institutions. It has been said, only half facetiously, that the color of integration in business is green. Through proper approach, application of effective human relations techniques, and efficient follow-up methods, the affirmative action program of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity has achieved significant success in providing thousands of new job opportunities with minimal friction.

Because the program of the federal government involves millions of contracts and thousands of contractors, their compliance program today is reaching primarily large and diversified concerns. It is anticipated that the program of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice will reach smaller companies, either those not covered under one of the federal executive orders, or else on a level not reached by the compliance review system of the federal government's program.

Finally, other independent actions in this field are underway. For example, the program of the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race, which is utilizing the economic resources of the Catholic, Protestant and Jewish religious institutions to promote equal employment opportunity, and the program of the United Church of Christ, to utilize its purchasing power to promote merit employment, and also to apply its investment and banking power to the same end. Subsequent to the inauguration of a merit employment program in a particular diocese or religious community, the Conference hopes to seek involvement with other faiths and communities in the same area.

America Magazine, the Jesuit weekly, has called the Conference program "Church Money for Justice" as noted above. It is furthermore, a reaffirmation of the second Commandment, by its expression of concern for our fellow citizens, and is a modern witness to the promise that we are our brothers' keeper.

TRUTH - LOVE - JUSTICE

The Affirmative Approach to Eradication of Discrimination in Employment

Announcement of the new program service of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice last September to eliminate discrimination in employment was headlined by some news media as "Catholic Boycott," and since then some writers have used terms such as "economic sanction," "purchasing power club," and others. In truth, PROJECT EQUALITY is none of these. To understand better how PROJECT EQUALITY works it is first necessary to understand how discrimination operates in employment. Probably as many businesses discriminate unconsciously today as do those which discriminate knowingly and purposefully. Even then many firms which consciously discriminate do so not out of hatred or particular dislike for minority group persons, as do so out of fear of venturing into the unknown, out of lack of imagination and executive reluctance to accept the challenge of change, out of sheer procrastination and failure to assign this vital area of personnel management the priority which it should have on today's business world.

Discrimination exists today due to a deficiency in our education, due to bad habits learned over many years, due to unreasoning fears in dark corners of the mind which have never been subject to logical scrutiny in the light of the truth. Without some positive steps on our part, therefore, employment discrimination will cling to our way of life like many another out-dated and long since disproved theory which has not been rectified through education.

Truth, therefore, through education is the real goal of PROJECT EQUALITY, not punishment. And education through analysis and association and experience are the tools of PROJECT EQUALITY, not "boycott" or "sanction" or "force-feeding." There is really nothing coercive about PROJECT EQUALITY, but it is true that nothing can be taught a student who will not come to class, and therefore no diploma can be awarded.

A premise of PROJECT EQUALITY is that church institutions have an obligation to spend their money in a moral manner. Firms which practice rigid discrimination injure the economy as a whole, perpetuate false notions in the minds of their employees, and pose a problem to church jurisdictions which are not willing to use their purchasing power to enforce discriminatory practices. Employment discrimination, according to the Catholic bishops of the United States, is morally wrong. Employment discrimination, according to the laws of the United States, is legally wrong. In this context, church institutions which adopt PROJECT EQUALITY come forth as adherents to constitutional laws, as practitioners of moral law, and as teachers of the right and the good which is their proper role.

There have been two principal approaches to combat employment discrimination in the past twenty-five years. One, which might be termed "legislative", posits a law against such discrimination, and then imposes penalties against those found to have violated this law within its jurisdiction. The second approach developed in 1961 might be called "educative." In this approach a person or other entity which did not wish to enforce discriminatory practices through the use of their purchasing power, claimed their moral and legal right to spend this money where they saw fit, and to judge the product or service offered not only on the basis of price and quality, but also on the basis of how it was made. Those firms which dealt in child-labor, for example, could not expect to be considered when a decision was reached as to where to spend one's money.

The educative and creative part of this second approach, however, was supplied by the purchaser through the medium of technical assistance to the seller as to how to correct those deficiencies in the product which made it "non-competitive." In doing so the buyer spent his time and efforts to assist the seller to learn the up-to-date methods which would benefit his own business as well as the total economy.

Finally, the result of the second approach was the re-education of the seller and its employees, resulting in their gradually changed attitudes and in the eradication of discrimination in their ideas about their fellow men, as well as in their practices towards them.

PROJECT EQUALITY, a program service of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, was developed for Catholic Church jurisdictions in the U.S., and is based on love of our fellow man -- be he a minority group member or one who holds an attitude and practices a policy which is un-Christian, illegal and immoral. If we witness our brother being attacked, we have an obligation to protect and assist him, and then a further obligation to those who have attacked him to teach Christ's love for all men. This is the approach and the purpose of PROJECT EQUALITY -- and in keeping with the teaching of Christ -- there can be no other approach for those institutions which would carry on His work among men.

PROJECT EQUALITY EXPANDS TO INTERRELIGIOUS PROGRAM IN DETROIT

On December 16, 1965 the Metropolitan Detroit Council of Churches, the Jewish Community Council of Metropolitan Detroit, and the Detroit Council of Eastern Orthodox Churches joined with the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Detroit to initiate the first interreligious PROJECT EQUALITY program in the United States. Each of the four religious bodies nominated three directors to a governing board of a new corporate entity to be known as PROJECT EQUALITY OF METROPOLITAN DETROIT. The directors then met and elected officers for a one-year term. Chosen for the dual position of president and board chairman was Reverend Robert A. Hoppe, who is Executive Secretary of the Commission on Race and Cultural Unity of the Detroit Council of Churches. Mr. John Shepherd of the Jewish Community Council of Metropolitan Detroit was named legal advisor to the board and corporate secretary. Very Rev. Thomas Ruffin, President of the Council of Eastern Orthodox Churches, was named vice-president, and Father James J. Sheehan of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese was elected treasurer. The four denominational groups then pledged to contribute predetermined shares to an annual budget to house, staff, and supply administrative offices for the new corporation.

Mr. Launbural W. Spriggs, Detroit resident and businessman, was appointed staff director of PROJECT EQUALITY OF METROPOLITAN DETROIT at a press conference held at the Sheraton-Cadillac Hotel in Detroit on December 16th. Mr. Spriggs thus becomes the first full-time professional employed locally by religious bodies in the United States to assist them in eliminating discrimination from their own employment practices and to perform similar services for their suppliers of goods and services. The Protestant, Jewish, Orthodox, and Catholic denominations underwriting the program thus will rely on the efforts and evaluations of Mr. Spriggs' office to help them determine where millions of dollars of purchasing of goods and supplies should or should not be spent in the coming years. Mr. Spriggs' offices and staff will be located at 305 Michigan Avenue, Detroit. He will report directly to the executive committee of officers of the governing board of PROJECT EQUALITY OF METROPOLITAN DETROIT.

VICE-PRESIDENT HUMPHREY COMMENDS PROJECT EQUALITY PROGRAM

The Vice-President of the United States, Hubert H. Humphrey, has commended the religiou jurisdictions and the many Roman Catholic Archbishops who have joined in the national PROJECT EQUALITY program to date. In telegrams to the various denominational heads, the Vice-President has stated as follows:

To Archbishop John F. Dearden of Detroit:
"Let me congratulate you and the Archdiocese of Detroit for announcing the PROJECT EQUALITY program. Your commitment to promote equal employment opportunity with all persons doing business with the archdiocese is a major step forward in this nation's effort to make available the blessings of our land to all persons regardless of race, color or creed."

To Archbishop Henry J. O'Brien of Hartford:
"This addition to the growing network of PROJECT EQUALITY programs throughout America is a proud testament of a church with a social conscience and a people determined to make equal job treatment a fact and not just a theory."

REPORTS

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (NCC)

LOS ANGELES

THE FIRE THIS TIME

A post mortem on a riot is impossible to write. The statistics are overwhelming. The crisis, literal and in the minds of men, which created the statistics is overwhelming. Prophets are a dime a dozen; a path to the sun and back could be paved with newsprint. We are in a veritable paroxysm of self-analysis.

One heard in Los Angeles a considerable amount of trash about how well everybody got along with everybody's maid. Fine. It is time now to talk to the Molotov cocktail lighter, not just the domestic. (Incidentally, the maid may have a good bit more to say than you have any idea.) It is time for a man to protest when his street is swept but another man's is not. It is time to insist on places at the council tables for "the least of these"—there is the chance, after all, that the demonic is articulate and wise. It is a time to get a noseful of oppression. It is a time to imagine what it might be like not to have a room to go to, to have a door to slam shut against whatever-it-is. It is a time to learn how you face today and tomorrow and tomorrow when there is no job.

We search for keys, but the door is already open. Michael Harrington said it: "If it is indeed a terrible thing that the people of Watts have spoken their manifesto as they did—and it is—then remember that it was the only way they could get anybody to listen." The voice of the oppressed has been heard, this time in the land of the palm tree. Los Angeles, Harlem, who will say where in the future—all ask: "Which side are you on, boy, which side are you on?"

View from the window

THEY SAID IT COULDN'T BE DONE—HERE

Los Angeles was, altogether, in a kind of sociological accident ward in the weeks after the rioting. Social scientists, officials, seers, the wise, the foolish, everybody gathered around the battered body, probing wounds, recalling past diagnoses, issuing prescriptions. An injection of money was ordered, and the hope was that the patient could be slapped on the back and sent home to recuperate. The patient protested that he needed operation after operation and more operations still, plus constant care and feeding and cleaning, plus a round-the-clock vigil. People smiled a little nervously. Too much talk about sickness isn't good.

The picture through the bullet-riddled window was taken from the second floor of Muhammad's Mosque of Islam No. 27, on Broadway just south of 56th Street, in Los Angeles August 19, about 36 hours after the police sacked the place. The helmeted men in the background are National Guardsmen; the man on his hunkers is a captain. A Guardsman is shown snapping the captain's picture. The sun was high that afternoon. It was, definitely, a good day for taking pictures.

It would be wrong to say, on the weekend after the Los Angeles riots of 1965, that it was holiday, tourist business-as-usual for all the city. Nerves were still frayed, even if there were the distractions of preseason football and three major league baseball games. It would not have been, in all probability, a good idea for Police Chief William H. Parker to go down to Watts. National Guard troops, earnest kids with out-sized helmets and bayonet-fixed rifles, patrolled the streets, like extras from a movie lot. It was a time of name-calling. Governor Brown said Chief Parker's statements ("We are on top and they are on the bottom" is a good example) were very, very unfortunate. Martin Luther King, Jr., said Chief Parker should resign. The police chief told the American Legion the country faced destruction unless there was respect for law and order. Mayor Sam Yorty attacked Sargent Shriver as responsible for the clogged War on Poverty pipeline. Shriver said the mayor's remarks were intemperate and questioned the mentality of the mayor, the police chief and others toward the poor. The mayor, grabbing a hay-fork himself, assailed the governor for making political hay with the McCone investigating commission. Both the mayor and the police chief blamed the State Highway Patrol for mishandling the original arrest. Whites said responsibility went with rights. A columnist on L.A.'s afternoon paper said the rioters were "depraved" (surely as off-the-mark, yet pernicious, as any adjective used) while others went hunting for "responsible" Negro leaders, the implication being that there must be someone acceptable to talk to, would he just step forward, please? Negroes loosed a hurricane of bitterness at the police chief and white merchants who peddle third-grade meat at premium prices. Everybody accused everybody else of hogging the TV cameras. It was a time when one baseball player slugging another with a bat still made people nervous about race.

Los Angeles blew up August 11, not in the choking squalor of Harlem but against a backdrop of hibiscus, oleander, lemon trees, broad boulevards, neat lawns and, for the first time, terrible flame. The box score was three dozen dead (since most were Negroes, it is difficult to sustain the thesis that the riot was purely a racial assault by black against white, without the overtones of class upheaval; the point is that "whitey" must solve the jobs problem and forget the race thing), some 900 wounded, more than 4,000 arrested, nearly 1,000 buildings burned and/or pillaged and $50 million in damage. L.A.'s was the third most murderous outbreak in this country in the 20th Century, ranking behind only the 1917 East St. Louis, Illinois, and 1919 Chicago killing. By any standard of chaos, Los Angeles is the national champion of modern times.

The person who broke the first window pulled the trigger, but what went into the explosion itself? Police excesses, beginning with crude forms of address, unemployment which staggers up over the 30-percent mark, infamous Proposition 14, an off-limits sign, if not fact, to prospective house hunters, the great expectations unfulfilled in the glamor capital of the universe—each contributed.

Here is the post-riot analysis of the situation by a knowledgeable observer, Paul Weeks, of the Los Angeles Times:

"1. Widespread disorder, suppressed only at military gunpoint, could erupt again unless remedial measures besides force are soon forthcoming.

2. Mistrust and disrespect between elements of law enforcement and the stricken community—the law-abiding as well as the law-breaker—are unabated, or worsened, by any dialogue in the aftermath.

3. Latent bigotry, within unsophisticated white population tending to blame the whole Negro race for the violence, increases the peril of racial incidents community-wide—similarly, from those Negroes who blame on 'whitey' rather than the social structure in which all are participant.
4. Most of Los Angeles, self-deluded, opened its doors as a haven for the oppressed Southern Negro—then unknowingly or insensitively locked him into another closet of frustration and despair.
5. The civil rights movement, middle-class oriented here, failed the truly poverty-stricken. It lost leadership when the general community did not heed warnings that advocates of non-violent protest, lacking highly visible successes, would be repudiated.
6. The rioting was by no means a conscious civil rights protest but an emotional explosion that swept erstwhile orderly citizens into mob lawlessness.
7. Unplanned, the uprising was seized upon in its early hours both by bigots fanning black supremacy flames and hoodlum gang depredators.
8. Its duration and high cost in life and property stemmed in part from tactical difficulties—guerrilla fighting against scattered pockets of resistance, which were mobile because even the poorest drive cars here in the absence of efficient public transport.
9. Root causes of human neglect were abetted by specifics: Disillusionment over collapse of the anti-poverty program; a feeling, right or wrong, that in passing Prop. 14, whites were posting a 'keep out' sign on their neighborhoods.
10. A law enforcement incident and hot weather triggered the loaded gun. The inquiry panel appointed by Gov. Brown must search out the truth in painstaking detail, regardless of political backfire."

C. Vann Woodward put the L.A. riot into the national perspective in this way:

In judging the progress of a revolution, much depends on whether the bottle is seen as half full or half empty; whether one concentrates on what has been done or what remains to be done. . . . [The] Negro is now measuring his advance, not by what he once was, but by what the white man now is*; not by outgrown scarcity but by surrounding abundance; not by old expectations, but by new possibilities.*

Some $1.7 million in anti-poverty funds were pumped into the area for riot recovery, and a highly-questionable compromise was worked out to take the wraps off $29 million in O. E. O. program money (the riot cost twice as much as the L.A. War on Poverty will). A Presidential task force hurried out to the Coast. And Southern California's churches banded together to form a Commission on the Church and Race.

It took a riot to get Los Angeles this far. Its future course is undetermined. There is no reason to expect a miracle, even at a cost of 36 lives; no top city official went to Watts in the crucial post-riot days, which makes one wonder what kind of hearing aid is needed.

And they said it couldn't be done. . . .

WATTS

Watts and its immediate neighbors in South Los Angeles are the port of entry to the West Coast for Dixie's Negroes. Just how busy the port has been in the post-World War II era is shown in census figures: for 1950, about 170,000 Negroes in the city; for June 30, 1965, about 420,000. The housing isn't what Harlemites are accustomed to, but four times as many people live in L.A.'s "Black Channel" as in the rest of the area (a palm tree is really an inadequate fringe benefit). Unemployment engulfs about a third of the population. Everybody can vote, of course, and the lunch counters are open; L.A. takes considerable pride in pointing this out. Yet there is so little communication, so much mistrust, that John A. Buggs, a Georgian who has been at the helm of the L.A. County Human Relations Commission for 14 years and ought to know, doubts whether more than two percent of South L.A.'s Negroes would emigrate, even if they had the money.

All this came abruptly and terribly apart with a simple arrest the night of August 11. A week later, on the first day of the armistice, visitors took a close look at that part of the city that somehow had always ended up on the cutting-room floor.

The Bank of America on Central Avenue, one of the spines of Watts, was intact, but the market across the street from it was gutted by fire. Blackened walls and listing roof signs pocked other corners. The city's branch library was untouched, but the Department of Power and Water had lost its glass face. A warehouse outlet was interesting; its huge plate window was gone, but appliances stood just inside, as though business had never been interrupted. Industrial sites were spared, as were the shops with "Negro owned and operated" sprayed on in white paint. But for the white entrepreneur it had been burn, baby, burn. The rubble of glass in front of clothing stores and markets and yellow-helmeted workmen testified to this.

To the west, on Main Street around 67th and 68th, there are rows of square cement blockhouses. Between them are alleys so narrow the sun couldn't get into dry the clothes hung on the lines. Women are talking in knots; they look up as the car passes. One wonders whether the women are herded into the blockhouses every night. The concrete pens are the only ones seen. In the next block or so, there are the stucco homes in pastel shades, the lawns and the straight, towering palms.

Muhammad's Mosque stands at 5606 S. Broadway. It was a neat two-story structure as recently as midnight August 17. Two hours later, however, the police stormed the temple, pouring a reported 500 rounds into the building. (Nobody was hit by bullets, however.) By actual check, the only room at—or near—the front of the Muslim headquarters to escape flying lead was a bathroom. A man is digging slugs out of the plaster. The police used everything but bazookas, it seemed. The interior—basement, ground floor and upper floor—have been methodically reduced to a shambles. A large pot of beans, cooked, is dumped out of a refrigerator; it could have hidden a small pistol. Two TV sets have been plugged, right through the forehead. Racked suits have been slashed. A mimeograph machine is wrecked. On a new typewriter, the "j" is bent at right angles. There was a fire in the basement. On the first floor, in the main hall, a smashed clock is on its back; its hands point to 1:39, the time of the raid.

John Shabazz, the Muslim credited with carrying so much weight in Watts, is out, and nobody else will talk. The sentinels at the door are as silent as drugstore Indians and as impassive. There is only one exchange in 45 minutes. Before the white visitors leave, one probes for contact with a Muslim, remarking, "They really did a good job, didn't they?" The reply: "Yes, you really did."

Words are superfluous. The whole bit is tacked up on the wall of the nursery. There, in red, blue and green, is pinned a paper train, each car bearing a letter in the word "nursery." There is a white child in each car of the paper nursery train on the wall, and the face of each white child is crayoned brown or black.

It is during this visit that the four National Guardsmen make their brief appearance.

Over on 103rd Street and Success (correct) Avenue, the community building at lovely Will Rogers Park is being converted into a depot. Perhaps 100 women and children file slowly inside where a nine-member team of County Bureau of Public Assistance workers is filling out food-requisition forms. The supervisor, Miss Peggy Smith, slender, attractive, harassed, talks between phone calls. The Salvation Army is sending food, so there will be no more emergency grocery orders. As it was, the limit was five days; a family of 14 people could expect a maximum $43.85. Peggy Smith acknowledges the agency is a little late, since the real food crisis passed the weekend before.

Outside, the two Guardsmen stand at ease in an archway, bayonets fixed to gun muzzles. They are protecting the park-turned-campsite from the women and children, apparently. "If everything goes OK," says one Guard who works for the state and seems to be moonlighting, the troops will be out over the weekend. Everything was OK, it turned out, but the troops stayed in town for another week anyway. It is hard to imagine the bright kids in the food line assaulting the Guardsmen; it is hard, too, to imagine the friendly Guard pointing that M-1 in earnest.

A few paces away, two men in Guard fatigues and a Negro man talk. Verbal souvenirs of a riot. Chatting, yet a moment ago, enemies, afraid.

Around 104th Street and Compton Avenue, there is the Hacienda Village, a project of 184 one-story units built in 1942. Mrs. Una Green, a handsome woman who is the manager, is proud as punch of the Village and its people. The grass is clipped, workmen are putting up a wire fence around a paved area and in one building, teenagers who operate a canteen are running "The Bowery

After the riot

Boys Meet the Monsters" for the sunsuit set. There are no Cokes in the machine; someone says the distributor was afraid to come. "Nobody bothers to turn around and take a picture here," Mrs. Green complains, surveying her domain.

On Beach Street, a block from the 103rd Street main drag, is one of the few visible forms of the church—Westminster Neighborhood Association, Inc. Westminster is a community center, canteen and information office most of the time. That afternoon, it is a distribution point for wooden boxes bearing the legend, "Medical Emergency Supplies, Property of Los Angeles," and cartons of evaporated milk. There is a gaggle of people, upstairs and down; the switchboard buzzes constantly. In an office at the back, executive Archie W. Hardwick, 31 but looking 10 years older, talks between interruptions. He points out the window to the spot where a pregnant woman was fatally bayoneted. He is a Presbyterian from Chicago and holds a Master's in social work.

"Just call me plain old Archie from now on. Social work is out after last week. The problems that exist are going to require a different approach. ADC is out, mental health, all the traditional bureaucratic approaches to helping people are out. The basic problem is economic, which requires educational programs, massive redevelopment, better housing. . . ." He ticks off a list of things, watching for the high sign that the governor, for whom everybody has been waiting for hours, has come. The governor has promised to visit Watts; it is late afternoon, and he has not come, as expected, to Westminster (he never got there, although he made a quick trip later to Rogers Park). But Archie Hardwick waits and waits. A minister sticks his head in the door, says he saw the governor in a hotel lobby four hours before and learned that the governor wasn't coming. A young woman blisters the minister for not passing the information along, and he leaves, closing the door very softly.

"Everyone wants to know what's the Negro problem," an irate man on the street says. "Everyone is an individual. I've got to know your individual experience." Ex-convict, out of work, he, too, was waiting for the governor. Equal rights, police brutality, discrimination at the meat counter, a litany. "The Negroes are trying to find their home," he says.

"I don't know why" the chili store behind Westminster was burned to the ground, another man says, "but if I had, it was because of the white owner. Accomplished more in a week than they (meaning the people in the South) did in a year." It was not a call to arms, simply an after-the-fact observation. Maybe now "something will happen."

A Baptist preacher took his card out ("Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord," it said) and began a diatribe based on 24 years in Watts. He crossly brushed aside the other talk as trash. "We've got to start from now." That meant Negro kids had to stay in school, to learn skills and keep jobs and support families, to develop personal pride. It also meant the management—white—of a nearby supermarket had to take some soap and water or something to the floor of the store. The concrete was black with dirt, the sawdust at the meat counter ancient. "Don't this make you sick? That guy is so busy making money he don't have time to mop the floors," he said disgustedly. He stalked down and up the aisles and out into what was left of the sun as fast as he could go.

"Everything they say about the police is true and then some," the minister said. He said the law went "shopping for tickets," framed the kids so that "65 percent of them have records and are ruined before they're 21." He also believed the riots were a city plot, explaining that the arrest of the week before was part of a conspiracy to make Los Angeles look so bad that the Federal government would have to pour money in. It was a theory not heard elsewhere. Wrong or right, it was part of one man's thinking. There was nobody from the city to tell him he was wrong. The black preacher said that "unless they reach in here and get a man a job. . . ." He didn't say what would happen.

At Westminster again, Chief Parker came in for some more target practice. So did the ministers, who "wouldn't come down because they were so busy deciding who would be on television." The governor was over at Rogers Park by this time, but nobody at Westminster knew it. They were still waiting.

Exactly two weeks after the Los Angeles riots began, Southern California had a Commission on the Church and Race, put together by top churchmen on an emergency footing. The Rev. James C. Moore, of the staff of the National Council of Churches' Commission on Religion and Race, took part in the preliminary discussions. His report follows:

TOWARD THE NEW CITY

Southern California has been called a "land of promise." The bright sunshine, the palm trees, rushing freeways, carefully manicured residential sections and teeming business districts all seem to support this illusion. After World War II, millions of people poured into the area, particularly around Los Angeles, looking for new opportunity and a new life. The veneer of success and affluence covers the California Southland.

And the churches share this veneer. The denominations have been busily building new structures to house potential worshipers in the burgeoning population. Contemporary architects are designing contemporary buildings for this most contemporary culture. One gets the feeling that the churches belong to this world, this land of promise, perhaps too much.

Thousands of Negroes came to Los Angeles after World War II, believing in the promised land. Most came from the South, where hope had been killed, to this new Southland of the West where they were led to believe that hope could be resurrected again. And here we may have one of the main reasons for the outburst of violence. What other recourse can a man take when his hopes have been raised only to be shattered again? The residents of Watts turned it into a wasteland, but they only added new wreckage to the accumulated debris of shattered dreams and blasted illusions. Whatever the reasons for the riot in Watts, it did serve the purpose of shaking up the white community and its leaders to a degree never achieved before. We heard again and again expressions of shock and horror but, even more, declarations of real surprise. It seemed that almost everyone, and this was particularly true of church leaders, did not realize that they had such a time bomb in their midst.

One bishop, at a public meeting, said that the explosion had come to him "as a bolt from the blue." At the same time, he set the mood for many church leaders by confessing his own insensitivity and assuming his share of responsibility for allowing this to happen. We did not hear churchmen mouthing the usual cliches of white liberals who have been put to the test. Some congregations, including Woodland Hills Methodist Church, began to provide food and other relief supplies even while the riot was going on. They began to look for other ways to serve during the crisis, and more than that, proceed to deal with the problems minority citizens have to face all over Southern California. They had begun to hear the ticking of other time bombs in every part of their sun-washed land.

The staff members of the Commission on Religion and Race spent many hours discussing courses of action with church leaders in Los Angeles. Some worked almost exclusively in the riot-torn area. Our legal counsel was instrumental in establishing a Los Angeles chapter of the Lawyer's Constitutional Defense Committee to provide legal assistance to those in jail. Others worked with the leadership of white and Negro churches.

On Wednesday, August 25, ten top executives from the major Protestant and Orthodox communions in Southern California gathered together to take concerted action. They wasted no time in recriminations for the failure of the churches in the past—rather they made it clear that their failures were costly lessons which had been learned. They said that a new direction must be taken to implement their proclamations about racial justice and equality, a direction which would lead them into direct involvement with the minority peoples of their region. In a move without precedent in Southern California, and perhaps unique for the nation, they created, in two hours' time, an emergency Commission on the Church and Race and pledged themselves to raise $100,000 to finance a program for the first year.

The new commission is a part of the Southern California-Nevada Council of Churches directed by Dr. Forrest Weir. Dr. Julian J. Keiser, United Church of Christ executive who has been serving as coordinator of the council's Civil Rights Committee, will be its acting executive director until such time as a full-time executive is hired. The present chairman is Dr. Carroll L. Shuster, top executive of the United Presbyterian Church in Southern California and a vice president of the council.

Dr. Shuster, who made many trips to the Watts area (now called "Charcoal Alley") both during and after the riot, said at a press conference the next day that the new commission would not announce a final program until consultations had been held with the leaders and residents of communities where the action agency proposes to work.

"Too often in the past, patronizing programs have been imposed upon persons in need without prior consultations and their inclusion in decision making processes," Dr. Shuster said. "This is no time for the churches to be paternalistic, for God has not given us this right. We will work with people—not for them."

Dr. Shuster met the press flanked by Dr. Carl W. Segerhammar, president of the council and the Synod of the Pacific Southwest, Lutheran Church in America;

Bishop Gerald Kennedy, resident Methodist Bishop of the Los Angeles Area; Dr. H. H. Brookins, pastor of the First A.M.E. Church in Los Angeles and chairman of the United Civil Rights Committee, and Dr. Keiser.

Dr. Brookins' presence was particularly significant, for although long involved in work with the council, he has been much in the public eye in Los Angeles by serving as the official representative of the Community Anti-Poverty Committee. For nearly nine months, CAC has been involved in a struggle with the city's anti-poverty committee attempting to guarantee that poor people have a say in the administration of the poverty program.

The commission came down squarely on the side of the poor by declaring that they had been appalled at the "incredible insensitivity displayed by some elected officials" which kept Federal funds from coming into Los Angeles. They said that had these public officials been "less concerned with power and more concerned with the poor, our community might not have experienced the whirlwind of destruction which has been visited upon us."

Much was made in the press over the post-riot "compromise agreement" worked out to allow anti-poverty funds to come in. While "reluctantly" supporting the compromise because of the long delay and great need, the commission made it clear that it does not intend to allow the poverty program in Los Angeles to become a mere political boondoggle. They pointed out that the poverty board does not provide for maximum feasible participation by the residents of the areas affected upon the board as required by Federal law. "The board allows for minimal participation by the poor," the church leaders declared. "We fear that as composed, the board will all too easily be able to stifle the voice of the poor. We intend to do all in our power to see that this does not happen."

Dr. Brookins and the poor people who chose him as their representative have been fighting a lonely battle. It is clear, now, that they have new allies who intend to be heard, even if it means coming into direct conflict with the city administration. There are those who believe you can fight city hall.

Another immediate action of the commission was the announcement of the establishment of its own board of inquiry to look into all the causes, both immediate and deep-rooted, of the Watts riot. Of course, investigation is the order of the day now. But the churches' inquiry will be markedly different from other investigatory agencies in that it will include residents of the Watts community as full participants on the board. Without prejudging the findings of an investigating commission appointed by Governor Brown, or any others, the churchmen pointed out that their efforts will be free from all political ties and "will be able to place responsibility for the rioting wherever it truly belongs."

The issue of police harrassment and alleged brutality is much in the news. The new commission did not duck this question but, at the same time, made it clear that they have no "ready-made" solutions to the problem. The board of inquiry will deal with it, of course, and after findings have been drawn, the churches will have recommendations to make to the city.

The church leaders have taken steps to insure that the new Commission on the Church and Race will be more than a paper organization. Its board will be composed of the elected head of each denominational judicatory in Southern California plus thirty other members chosen for their special skills in the field of human relations. This is to insure that the responsible leadership of the churches will be directly involved. At this stage, they are projecting a staff of four persons including the executive director, with three of these persons to work directly in the communities and with the people where the needs are greatest.

They will be working in Watts immediately to assist in the massive reconstruction program which is desperately needed. In addition, they are taking steps to see that the legal rights of more than 4,000 persons arrested during the riot are protected. They have included in the mandate for the commission the tools of demonstrations and direct action when necessary. They have created an agency which will be able to go to the roots of the racial problems affecting Southern California and take action to solve these problems with the speed crisis demands.

The commission does not anticipate a calm sea and easy sailing as the churches launch this new program. Rightist forces in Southern California are sure to attack any direct involvement of the churches in the struggle for racial justice, since they seem to see the church as a social club rather than the Body of Christ. But they declared that, although arriving late on the scene of the struggle for full justice and opportunity for all citizens, "We are here now, and we intend to stay."

The church leadership of Southern California has been deeply shocked by the violence which rocked the city of Los Angeles. They see their sins of omission and are willing to take their share of the blame for the lives which were destroyed. But they see that a greater sin would be not to act now that past failures have exacted this terrible toll. Perhaps history will mark one gain from the great Los Angeles disaster of August, 1965—that the churches were purified in the fires of "Charcoal Alley."

COMMISSION ON RELIGION AND RACE REPORTS is designed to keep interested persons and organizations informed of what the churches are doing in the current struggle for full human rights for all our citizens. With primary attention being given to the activities of the National Council of Churches' Commission on Religion and Race, it will also deal with denominational and interreligious efforts to advance the goals of the freedom revolution. Additional copies are available at 15¢ each; 100 copies or more at 10¢ each. Payment must accompany order.

MISSISSIPPI WOMEN'S PLANNING SESSION - REPORT

November 18-19, 1966, Jackson, Mississippi agency

National Council of Negro Women, Inc.

OPENING SESSION - YWCA, North Farish Street

Greetings: Mrs. C.C. Mosley, Temporary Chairman, Jackson Section, National Council of Negro Women.

Orientation: Miss Dorothy I. Height, National President, NCNW.

1. Growth and Range of Volunteer Work

Miss Dorothy Height, in her opening remarks stated:

> During the years in which the National Council of Negro Women has had programs in the State of Mississippi, it has become aware of the many people who are dedicated to the goals of strengthening the Negro woman and her family life. Progressive programs have already taken place in Mississippi; for example, the Special Training Institute on the Problems of School Desegregation at the University of Mississippi. Now we need to confront ourselves with the thought that in these times we are not only faced with the normal change seen in every generation, but with the speed of change that this generation is experiencing.
> As we consider, during this planning conference, the new look in volunteer services - the volunteer as the person who works by his free will - we hope to define the needs and methods of work for the volunteer who is also a working woman, a wife and a mother, but who is acutely aware that there are many needs still to be met, and that her role is to help meet them.
> We must, during this planning session, decide if a training program is desirable in Mississippi, whether NCNW can help with such a program, and, if so, what are the issues, the problems and the needs.

2. Areas and Services of Interest to NCNW

The 49 participants in this opening session, from 15 communities, as well as staff and consultants, introduced their neighbors (after a few moments of query) by name, location, profession and volunteer activity. Among the Mississippi women, nine were community organizers, 14 had worked or were working with Head Start, eleven were or had been teachers - elementary through college - four were social workers, one a librarian, several were employed in social agencies such as the YWCA, Urban League and STAR. Volunteer work included : United Church Women, Catholic Ladies of Charity, NCCW, Girl Scouts, SCLC, NAACP, Womanpower Unlimited, F.D.P., Citizens' Committee for Urban Renewal, Women in Community Service (WICS), and NCNW.

After the introductions, the participants, staff and consultants broke into small buzz groups to prepare statements of the community needs and the problems to be considered in this planning session.

3. Summary of Small Group Sessions

a) Certain rights, such as education, are unfulfilled.
b) There should be a place for women to be trained for jobs, to upgrade themselves.
c) A means must be found to channel resources and funds into the state.
d) The Planners should consider the "how to" of funding women who cannot volunteer for work without travel and food allowance.
e) The need for recreation centers and day care centers should be studied.
f) The Planners need to gather support for a Compulsory School Attendance Law.

SECOND DAY'S SESSION - Hotel Heidelberg

(Breakfast Meeting: Miss Height, Dr. Tatum, Miss Cramer, Dorothy Duke, Dr. Boyer, Gabe Beard, Polly Cowan. Summary of reactions to Opening Session)

4. Training Persons for Volunteer Work

Miss Height opened the meeting with a few words about the purposes of The National Council of Negro Women since its inception by Mary McLeod Bethune. The founder's goals were those of joining all hands to get the job done. From this goal to those of the planning session is a short step: increasing skills and adding womanpower to many volunteer projects already functioning in Mississippi, and bringing new volunteer projects into areas in need of them.

5. Areas of Work

Stimulated by these goals, the participants spoke of their own definitions of volunteer work. In the course of the discussion they spoke of the means of communicating with each other and with those who need to become involved.

Areas of Work, selected as primary needs:

a) welfare and educational needs of children
b) parents' relationship to the school
c) citizenship responsibilities
d) involving and training of youth for service
e) adult education and related need such as transportation to classes and tests
f) consumer education
g) using individual or group initiative in volunteer work to promote a cause
h) payment for food and travel when volunteers cannot afford out-of-pocket expenses
i) training sessions for filling out of all kinds of forms (leases, voter registration, applications for jobs or for training for jobs) as well as for program funding
j) implementing child labor laws

The participants spoke of the fact that the Negro woman has had to nurse the sick and bury the dead, and always make something out of nothing. They concluded that she is peculiarly well equipped to use initiative when there are no guidlelines. Now, however, the women agreed they wanted concrete proposals by which they could raise their families and themselves to a higher level. They spoke of the need for people with a better education and a good job to work for the general good because they have access to information and know how to use it. They told of their desire to bridge the gap between those who have received the benefits of education and those who have not.

6. Task Forces

To decide what The National Council of Negro Women can do to meet the overall needs of poverty, by developing potential and determining the projects and places which need leadership training for volunteer work, the group divided into five Task Forces.

Task Force leaders: Miss Gloria Cotton - McComb
Mrs. Annie Devine - Canton
Mrs. Mason - Biloxi
Mrs. Jeanette Smith - Hattiesburg
Mrs. Unita Blackwell - Mayersville

7. Reports from Task Forces

The Task Forces began their reports before lunch and concluded after the meal.

Group V - Mrs. Annie Devine:

Reported concern on the plight of the poverty- stricken and felt the need for leadership training for both young people and adults. The group asked for the tools with which to bridge the gaps, finding that groups do not reach out to one another. They specifically requested NCNW to find methods or proposals from which the entire community could benefit.

Group IV - Mrs. Mason:

Asked NCNW to help discover and train women for work on the needs of schools and school related problems, such as getting representation on school boards and in PTA's. Also work in helping adults to pass tests given for jobs.

Group III - Mrs. Unita Blackwell:

Requested NCNW to have training workshops on a regional basis throughout the state,and to find funds to make this possible.

Group II - Mrs. Jeanette Smith:

Asked for more information on the program and goals of NCNW and on how to organize sections in Mississippi.

Group I - Miss Gloria Cotton:

Requested same information as Group II, adding the need for information on how projects can get funds to pay the basic expenses of volunteers.

8. NCNW Program, Activities and Structure

Miss Height explained the concept and structure of the National Council of Negro Women and outlined Council programs such as : Women in Community Service (WICS), Consumer Education, the National Committee on Household Employment, WIMS, Project Womanpower and Volunteers Unlimited.

She expressed the Council's appreciation of the trust shown by the Mississippi participants as shown by the attendance at this meeting, called by the National Council of Negro Women. Answering the requests of the Task Forces, Miss Height said that NCNW would plan to begin a series of training programs: the first early in 1967. NCNW will supply training resources, staff and volunteers. The first workshop will be designed to answer the needs of those volunteers who wish to develop the skills for writing proposals for federal or foundation grants.

9. Consultants to the Mississippi Planning Session

Dr. Roscoe Boyer,Professor of Education at the University of Mississippi, spoke to the women on "grantsmanship". He told the women that any training program which emerged from this Planning Session had the support and the participation of the consultants from the University of Mississippi. He urged them to make use of the educational research by counties and school districts, which his department can make available on official request from the women. However, the University can help only if the request is made as it was for the Planning Session -- through some part of the National Council of Negro Women, its Mississippi membership or local sections.

Miss Marie Barksdale, Special Assistant for the Office of Economic Opportunity and a WIMS team member, gave information on the need nationally for technical assistance for writing proposals. She added that if the State of Mississippi does not submit its alloted number of proposals, another state will move in and use the money earmarked for Mississippi.

Mr. Coleman Miller, Director of a special program for community centers in Mississippi, which operates through the National Federation of Settlements, addressed the participants, stressing that if progress is to be made in the social service areas of Mississippi, it is the Negro women of the state who will do it.

10. Other Programs operating in the South

Discussion followed on the importance of relating the proposals to the needs of the community. Miss Height outlined the program of the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty, Southern Rural Action Project (SRAP), giving the example of the work in Crawfordville, Georgia. (The Greenville representative asked if her community could apply for a SRAP program).

11. Summary - Task Force and Steering Committee

Leaders of the five Task Forces rounded up their hopes from this Planning Session into one specific request :

> That leadership training should be geared toward helping people in the community to identify their problems and set forth solutions.

The steering committe of volunteers consists of the five Task Force leaders plus Mrs. Snowdon Jones of Greenwood, Mrs. Morton of Greenville, Mrs. Gooden of Oxford, and Mrs. Rucker of Greenwood. Mrs. Annie Devine and Mrs. C.C. Mosley will serve as co-chairmen.

WIMS NEWSLETTER

December, 1966

NCNW - WIMS has gone back to Mississippi. A Mississippi Women's Planning Session was held in Jackson, November 18-19th at the Hotel Heidelberg. Three WIMS team members were present: Dorothy I. Height as Chairman of the Planning Session, Marie Barksdale as a Consultant from OEO and Polly Cowan as Director of the Planning Session.

Miss Doris Dozier, staff member of NCNW Project Womanpower for the southern region, and Polly Cowan went to Mississippi a few days before the session, starting in Oxford, Mississippi and driving down to Jackson, visiting the East Tallachatchie County School System on the way. We saw many friends from the University of Mississippi, and met with the Oxford Section of NCNW. At the Planning Session, which was devised for women from 15 communities in Mississippi to plan for training of volunteer women of the state by NCNW - WIMS, we encountered many of your summer hostesses. At the meeting of the Jackson Section of NCNW, which was timed for Miss Height's visit, we also met with women who had been helpful to WIMS during 1964 and 1965. As we moved around Jackson, we had meetings with Ken Dean, Executive Director of the Mississippi Council on Human Rights, John Mudd and others of CDGM, people from MAP - Mississippi Action Program and Jean Carroll who is the director of the Jackson Head Start Program. One evening, we were invited by Aurelia Young, who had gathered together a group of Deltas and their husbands, all of whom expressed interest in the Planning Session and in lending a hand to the Jackson Section of NCNW.

The Hotel Heidelberg, where the women who were participants from out of town were housed, as were the consultants, and where our planning sessions were held, treated us with consideration which would have astonished those of you who stayed in the hotel in 1964. A sign announcing the Planning Session of THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF NEGRO WOMEN was placed where a similar announcement for the Chamber of Commerce might have hung.

In Oxford we saw the metal hanger where the sign "white only" had hung when Ellen Tarry spotted it in the summer of 1965. It swung -- empty.

Not everything in Mississippi is sweetness and light. Although integrated meetings in Jackson are rarely cause for harrassment, this is URBAN Mississippi. Rural Mississippi lags far behind. You all read the reports of shootings, bombings and fires in the churches. Just this month John W. Gardner, the Secretary for Health, Education and Welfare, said that the Hinds County School District has lost its federal aid for failure to comply with nondiscrimination provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. These Hinds County schools are in rural and suburban sections outside of Jackson and include twenty-four schools none of which have desegregated. Those few children who are in desegregated schools in other parts of the state are not usually treated as equals, either in the school room or on the playground.

We were struck by the polarization around OEO projects (generally Head Start) which has generated warring camps between people who were formerly sympathetic to each other. We noticed also that many of the "haves" in the Negro community are now further apart from the "have-nots". As the gap is widening, it seems to follow the pattern of gaps between the lines (economically) in northern communities.

The Mississippi Women's Planning Session took this matter into account during the discussion of training women for volunteer services. We cannot, in this newsletter, give you a detailed account of the day and a half of sessions, but we will send a complete report to any of you who ask for it. We can tell you that the Mississippi women concluded that NCNW should set up a series of workshops, and that the first of these, to be held early in 1967, will instruct women from wide-spread communities on the art of writing proposals for government or foundation funding. This will be followed by workshops relating to the skills needed in the many aspects of volunteerism.

This is where WIMS team members enter. Some of us have written proposals, or judged them. We would be useful consultants for the first workshop. The rest of us have a background of volunteerism, either as volunteers, or in working with volunteers. Your skills are needed - will you become consultants to these workshops?

NCNW - WIMS would like to hear from each of you about your free time during 1967 and whether you would like to return to Mississippi as consultants. We have built funds for travel into our budget. You would be volunteering your time and experience. Do let us know.

NEWS FROM WIMS AREAS

BOSTON

Laura Avery has moved to Newton. Her husband is the new superintendent of the Episcopal City Mission on Boston.

Laya Weisner and Ruth Batson are having great success with METCO, transferring 220 Negro children from Roxbury and North Dorchester to suburban schools. Their program might turn out to be a model for other communities throughout the United States.

NEW JERSEY

Edith Savage was a recipient of the Lane Bryant Annual Awards Citation as an individual for her volunteer service. Neither WIMS, (group Award) nor Edith, were winners. But it was a happy thing to have had these citations.

Dr. Hannah Levin substituted for Dr. Molly Harrower on a panel at the National Convention of the Psychological Association. Her speech included a discussion of her work with WIMS. Hannah's sister-in-law, Sue Miller, is in England with her family. Sue is working on remedial reading with a Ford Funded program in London.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mildred Pitt is now Mildred Pitt Goodman. All of WIMS congratulates Mr. Goodman. Billie Hetzel and Marguerite Cassell were together in Gatlinsburg, Tenn. Billie is to be congratulated on the passage of a bill setting up a public college in Washington due largely to her persistence and hard work. Geraldine Woods (California, but a member of one of the Washington Teams) President of Delta Sigma Theta, wrote us about a meeting she and her board has with President Lyndon Johnson in August. Discussion was on programs the President would like the Deltas to support with its womanpower. Gerry also recently attended a DACOWITS meeting.

Peg Roach moved from Washington to Chicago where she is working with the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice.

Jane McClary told us that her new book was published early November. We urge you to try your bookstores to buy it: THE WILL TO WIN is the title.

Mary Cushing Niles is in India once again working on the Friends World Institute.

CHICAGO

Elizabeth Haselden was a delegate of the American Baptist Convention to the World Order Conference of the Wrold Council of Churches, held in Geneva, Switzerland.

Selma Taub writes: "I saw Buddy Mayer and asked her if the women who are participating in our Fine Arts Program (National Council of Jewish Women) could go on a tour of her galleries. Of course Buddy said 'yes'. The women were thrilled with Buddy, her home, and the art collection. Besides my vice presidency in NCJW, I'm social chairman of our temple where we are in the process of holding a series of speakers and discussion sessions on Open Occupancy. Our Skokie Fair Housing Committee is not too successful ... We haven't gotten to first base with the realtors."

NEW YORK

Trude Lash was named by Mayor Lindsay to the new Council Against Poverty of New York City. This council is the policy-making body for the whold anti-poverty program, responsible for the allocation of both federal and city funds. It operates within the newly created Human Resources Administration.

Betty Barnes is working with the School Volunteers operating under the New York City Board of Education. Betty's interest is libraries: School Volunteers have instituted a crash program in schools that have overcrowding and understaffing to help with cataloguing and other library mechanics so that libraries will be fully utilized.

Marion Logan ran a party for Fanny Lou Hamer in October, and is planning another affair for Mrs. Hamer to collect clothes for the people of Ruleville. Mrs. Hamer will be in New York for another speaking engagement this month.

Susie Goodwillie is working with the press corps of the United Nations.

Ann Doubilet finished her job with the Civil Liberties Union (on F.A.I.R. during the campaign for the Police Civilian Review Board) and is now working at the Committee for Democratic Voters.

Rae Dudley is on a job for the New York City Board of Education as a community coordinator spending most of her time at one of the elementary schools which is a feeder school for I.S. 201.

Dorothy I. Height and Margaret Bender were the "planners and executors" of a two-day leadership seminar at the United Nations, directed toward "The Responsibility of Women in Human Rights." Marge Gross and Marguerite Cassell attended this first joint seminar run by the NCNW and the Women's Division, Board of Missions of the Methodist Church.

Gladys Zales is giving the final push to the Life Membership Awards Dinner for Monday, the nineteenth of December at the Plaza Hotel. Awardees are: Mrs. Arthur Goldberg, A. Philip Randolph and Walter Reuther. Lena Horne is co-chairman with Gladys.

ROUND-UP

From Jackson, Mississippi: Patt Derian is a consultant to OEO assigned to the Mississippi Action Project. Ann Hewitt has been in New York for two months, and as usual has been seeing more team members than we have seen of each other. Her volunteer work is for the MUST program, financed by the Methodist Church. She has promised WIMS her services when she returns to New York next summer.

From Omaha, Nebraska: Susie Buffett, long a friend of WIMS, is working on a new housing committee. WIMS answered a request from Susie for material on housing, tutoring programs and job training.

NEW PROJECTS FOR NCNW

All of you received the NCNW progress report, so you know of Project Womanpower, whose director is Mrs. Christine Clark, and Volunteers Unlimited which has Dr. Annabelle Sherman as its national director. Chris has assembled a staff which is ready to move regionally and will be marching off ot train volunteer leaders who will in turn train volunteers for many services. Eventually, Project Womanpower will be working in 30 cities in the United States.

Annabelle has three target areas for Volunteers Unlimited: D nville, Virginia, Minneapolis, Minnesota and Miami, Florida, where her professional staff will train women of varied backgrounds and experience as volunteers to work, under supervision, with girls who might otherwise be headed for trouble.

WIMS Northern Projects

PATERSON, NEW JERSEY

WIMS' new technique of a "Conversation Caravan" proved to be successful in Paterson, on September 17th. At the request of the local NCNW Section President, an all-day meeting was held at the Paterson "Y", attended by over 100 women representing different religions, races, organizations and economic groups. A panel discussion was held, followed by lunch, buzz sessions and a final plenary session. The three local Paterson women were joined by Trude Lash and Ilza Williams on the panel. Polly Cowan was moderator and Dorothy Height was the summarizer. The women discussed the most pressing needs of Paterson, and decided that the first and most important one that they wanted to tackle was housing. They proceeded to set another meeting date on October 5th for the purpose of establishing an organization to provide a mechanism through which those who had been working in their own individual ways can work in concerted fashion and develop a community action program encompassing all elements in the community. Esther Cooke from Jersey City attended the day's proceedings.

The October 5th meeting was held at the "Y". The new organization was named "Women's Council for Community Service." A steering committee was appointed, and it is already working to establish educational and action programs to meet the housing needs of Paterson.

An educational meeting of WCCS was held on November 9th and the first step was taken to move toward establishment of a Fair Housing Committee.

Because new issues arose regarding urban renewal problems, a November 29th steering committee meeting planned the next full meeting, December 14th, on the subject of urban renewal. At that time officers will be elected, and WCCS will take a formal structure.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

THROUGH THE YEARS the American Teachers Association sponsored a Human Rights banquet at its annual meeting. This was the period set aside to recognize outstanding leadership in the area of human rights.

SINCE THE HISTORIC merger of the American Teachers Association and the National Education Association in Miami, Florida during July, 1966, the NEA-PR&R Committee on Civil and Human Rights of Educators has assumed ATA's role in promoting this activity.

AMONG THE HIGHLIGHTS of the ATA's annual session was the ATA-NEA Joint Committee Open Meeting and the Human Rights Awards Dinner. Last year's dinner was reminiscent of the many pleasent experiences ATA conferees have had through the years.

Dear Mr. Stanfield:

This is to invite you to share in the second awards dinner meeting of the NEA Committee on Civil and Human Rights of Educators during the Annual Convention of the National Education Association on July 1, 1968 in Dallas, Texas, and in the Open Meeting on July 4.

The dinner is scheduled for 6:45 p.m. at the Hotel Adolphus, preceded by a reception at 5:45 p.m. Committees and Commissions hold open meetings during the Convention so that delegates and members may get a first hand report of their work. Our Open Meeting is scheduled from 2:30 - 4:30 p.m. on July 4 at the Statler Hotel in the Junior Ballroom.

Since the unification of the American Teachers Association and the National Education Association, the NEA Committee on Civil and Human Rights of Educators has been charged with carrying on many of the ATA ideals and traditions. In attempting to carry on some of the ATA awards and honors and at the same time promote a greater interest in human relations and human rights programs, our committee is sponsoring the second of what we hope will be an Annual Human Relations Dinner during the NEA Convention.

The main feature is the presentation of the H. Council Trenholm Award, a twin award to two persons of opposite races who have worked for harmonious race relationships within the education profession.

The Association for the Study of Negro Life and History will again present the Carter G. Woodson Award to the NEA local association sponsoring the best Negro History Week Program.

Awards by other agencies and by the Committee itself, will also be presented.

Tickets for the dinner will be on sale at the Convention for $7.50 each. However, tickets may be ordered in Advance from the NEA-PR&R Committee on Civil and Human Rights of Educators through June 7 at a 20 percent discount ($6.00 per ticket). We bring this to your attention at this time so that your interested delegates may take advantage of the $1.50 reduction for cash advance registration.

Sincerely yours,

Samuel B. Ethridge

USNSA Southern Project

Report of PROJECT's Activities
September and October, 1966

New Staff

The Project now has a secretary, Miss Sandra Egland. Originally, we had not intended to hire a secretary until we could obtain more office space; however, our limited budget makes other space unlikely; therefore, we hired Miss Egland although we have no desk for her.

Miss Gwen Patton (summarized from reports)

During the first two months of Project activity, Miss Patton has been very active. She has travelled extensively in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Tennessee and South Carolina. In addition she has planned a conference on "Extra- rricula Activities in an Educational Framework." This conference will be held in the early part of 1967.

Alabama--------Miss Patton has assisted the Tuskegee Institute students in their efforts to obtain salaries for the student government employees. She has also worked with students dissatisfied with compulsory chapel and R.O.T.C. At Alabama State College she worked with strengthening the student government and the student newspaper.

Tennessee------In Nashville, Tennessee, she worked with students in an effort to get an exchange program functioning between Fisk and Tuskegee Institute.

Georgia--------The students of the Atlanta University complex desired to have a seminar in Civil Rights, Miss Patton has worked with them in this effort.

Mississippi----The state of Mississippi has a law prohibiting state schools from becoming NSA members. This law was passed as a result of NSA's 1960 stand on civil rights. Some students at Jackson State College are dissatisfied with this, Miss Patton has worked with these students.

South Carolina-Miss Patton was invited to serve as a resourse leader for the Fall conference of the South Carolina Student Council on Human Relations. While in South Carolina, she also visited the campuses of Allen University, Benedict College and Vorhees College and attempted to encourage the students of these institutions to work to raise the educational standards of their school.

Mr. Tom Gardner (summarized from reports)

Mr. Gardner has spent his first two months in travel through North Carolina and Virginia. In addition, he has worked closely with students in the Atlanta, Georgia area.

Mr. Tom Gardner (continued)

Georgia--------Mr. Jody Palmer, a SSOC(Southern Student Organizing Committee) worker, stationed in Atlanta and Mr. Gardner have worked together in an effort to revive a student group at Emory University. Their first program was a panel discussion about the Atlanta riots. The program was attended by a large number of students and the response was favorable.

North Carolina-Mr. Gardner worked with some students at Duke University. He attempted to encourage them to engage in state-wide activities and to set up a literature table. He also discussed a University Reform conference with some interested students.

Virginia-------At the University of Virginia, Mr. Gardner worked with the Iconoclast, an indiginous newsletter. He also reconsiled the differences between the University of Virginia's SSOC chapter and the Student Union. The SSOC chapter wanted to set up a literature table. He spoke at the Virginia State College branch of the NAACP about the Southern Project. He also worked with the Southside Virginia Project and wrote a report for the NAACP on a case of discrimination.

Conferences----Mr. Gardner is now working on two conferences, one for visiting Bolivian Students and the other for insurgent newspaper editors.

Mr. Gardner's present assignment is to work on a project on the Draft and Discrimination.

Mr. Wm. Roberts(summarized from reports submitted)

The Director was tied down during the first two months with a great deal of administrative tasks, inherent in re-opening a Project that had been closed for over six months. His traveling before the new secreatry was hired was limited to within the state and mainly in the Atlanta area. After Miss Egland was hired; however, he was freed and began travelling more extensively into Georgia, South Carolina and Kentucky.

Georgia--------Mr. Roberts visited with many agencies in the Atlanta area to inform them that the Southern Project was re-opened. He also visited with the Student Governments of the schools of the Atlanta University Complex and has worked with them in their efforts to conduct a seminar in civil rights. He has also worked with the President of the Emory University Student Senate on speakers and programs for the campus, as well as on NSA affiliation for Emory.

Mr. Wm. Roberts(continued)

South Carolina-On a request from Project SPEED-UP, Mr. Roberts went to South Carolina to assist SPEED-UP in their efforts to obtain funds. SPEED-UP is a state-wide tutorial program. While in South Carolina, Mr. Roberts met with the Chairman of AWARE, a student group that is trying to activate the University of South Carolina campus.

Kentucky-------Mr. Roberts was invited to serve as a consultant for the fifth annual Kentucky Commission on Human Rights student conference. He used this opportunity to find out what is happening in Kentucky and to develop some useful contacts for future trips to Kentucky.

Georgia--------Mr. Roberts also visited on the University of Georgia campus. He spent the day with the Dean of Men's son and the director of the Presbyterian student center, the gathering place for most of the University's "liberal" students. He discussed Southern Project assistance with a tutorial program and an underground newsletter.

Conferences----Mr. Roberts has prepared a presentation for the Southern Education Foundation, the purpose of which was to raise funds for the proposed conference on "Extra-Curricula Activities in an Educational Framework." He has met with Mr. John Griffin, the Director three times and has been assured of an answer by the fifteenth of November. The Project has proposed that the Southern Education Foundation provide half of the conference expenses.

SIS----------Mr. Roberts has also prepared the first Student Involvement Series(SIS), A Guide to a Citizens Education Program.

General Comments

Staff relations have been strained during part of this period; however, the Director believes that these problems are becoming minor and that the Project is becoming more and more productive. The main problem now is financial. The Project's budget will need to be suplemented in order to obtain peak effeciency.

Conclusion

Two things have become clear during this short period: 1) for some reason students are unwilling to engage in activities. Apathy on the campus is greater than in previous years. 2) The Project staff needs to be increased. Miss Patton has suggested that extensive work we done in Mississippi and in South Carolina. There is also a great need to work more on educational issues. This in addition to regular activities spreads the staff too thin.

SUMMARY OF THE
SOUTHERN ADVISORY COMMITTEE MEETING
November 22, 1966

The meeting was called to order by Mr. Edward Schwartz, the National Affairs Vice President of the United States National Student Association. Those present were:

Miss Constance Curry
Mr. Curtis Gans
Mr. Joseph Hendricks
Rev. Charles Jones
Dr. James Laue
Mr. Andrew Lipscomb
Mr. M. Hayes Mizell

Much of the morning was spent in reports and general discussion, which is ommitted for the sake of brevity. The discussion which led to a programatic suggestion started with an assumption about the constituency of the Project. It was suggested that there was a choise of contiuency.

1) A coalition of the very active 2%.

2) Students on the campus itself. If this were chosen the goal would be to make the students aware of the community. By asking questions about education the Project could increase the student's sensitivity to other issues.

It was observed that the student must realize himself, as a student, before he could be effective in other efforts.

It was generally agreed that the constituency of the Project should be those willing to become involved. For this purpose a coherent program of educational reform was needed.

The following diagram was submitted to illustrate the ways in which an institution could be changed.

Explanation of the diagram

1. NSA and the Southern Project(SSHRP) could work directly with the students and incourage them to seek the means necessary for change.
2. NSA and SSHRP could contact graduate students and incourage them to teach in a Southern institution.
3. NSA and SSHRP could put pressure on state governments.
4. NSA and SSHRP could put pressure on accrediting agencies.

It was also noted that each of these techniques could result from different approaches. For example, by working with students NSA and SSHRP could put pressure on state governments or accrediting agencies.

The final consenses of the meeting was that the S uthern Project should conduct a series of conferences on "Institutional Self-Analysis" This Program would be in three stages or phases.

PHASE I

1. "Institutional self-Analysis conferences"
   a. White campuses-Bill
   b. Negro campuses-Gwen
2. Extra-curricular activity conference
3. Develop contacts with people

PHASE II

1. Grant
   1. Expand staff
   2. Conference geared to institutional self study-Still on local campuses.

Phase III

Second part of grant

NORMAN THOMAS
NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND
112 EAST 19TH STREET
NEW YORK 3, N. Y

Dear Friend:

I enclose a story of hope. One marginal farm family in South Carolina, rescued from debt and threatened eviction, shows the way for thousands of others.

Just recently we helped solve a similar crisis in Mississippi. Another small farm was about to be foreclosed. Only a few days were left when the National Sharecroppers Fund field man discovered the family's predicament. Quick action on the spot, plus immediate telephone calls between the NSF National Office and Washington and Jackson, saved the day--and the farm.

With help of the right kind--at the right time--families can, and do, reach self-sufficiency on their own farms. They achieve a new inner sense of dignity as they improve their farms and their homes through self effort. They need money, yes; most need the federal loans which the law provides. But, even more, they need technical advice, instruction in farm management, and the assurance that they have a knowledgeable advocate at the seat of power in Washington. For those who can no longer remain in farming, NSF helps set up retraining programs through its Southern Rural Training Project.

For generations Negro farm families have been shortchanged on federal assistance. While other farmers, South and North, were taught new techniques and crop diversification, and received the benefit of federal loans at reasonable interest, Negroes received either little or no help.

Change has now begun at the top. But it isn't coming fast enough. Scores of farm families--mostly Negro--are being evicted from the land. Some are trying to remain in the area, living in makeshift tents until basic help can come. NSF is working locally and nationally to interpret the needs, to supply guidance, and to affect public policy.

NSF's field staff and our southern statewide conferences are helping to bridge the gap between government programs and the rural poor, Negro and white, who urgently need help.

Please give as generously as you can to help support this vital effort. Your dollars enable us to bring not charity, but the chance to help themselves, to more poor farm families.

Sincerely,

Norman Thomas

New Hope for Mr. Williams

BEFORE

THIS IS THE WAY most sharecroppers, and many other farmers, live.

An NSF staff member first saw this house in 1963 when its owner, whom we shall call Mr. Williams, came to NSF for help.

There was a hole in the roof of every room but one, and in the floor. But the roof was worst, for neither the kitchen nor the living room could be used when it rained.

One third of all our farm housing is dilapidated, badly in need of repair.

Yet Mr. Williams came to us, not because the house was falling down around him, but because foreclosure threatened. He feared he was going to lose everything he had.

MR. WILLIAMS was a good farmer. He owned 112 acres of land, planted in cotton, tobacco, and soy beans. For 36 years he had farmed this land with his wife, and they had raised three children. The previous year his three crops had brought him a gross income of $3700. But that hadn't been enough for repairs to the house—it hadn't even been enough to make necessary payments on his debts.

Thousands of struggling small farmers are caught in the same terrible cycle, going deeper into debt every year because they earn so little. One reason for this is the exorbitant interest rates of private money-lenders. Mr. Williams paid 8 to 10 per cent on his various loans.

In 1963 Mr. Williams had a $7500 mortgage on his farm. He owed $1787 for farm machinery and other equipment. He had applied to Farmers Home Administration for a loan but had been refused because he still owed $1000 on a previous loan from this government agency. FHA, with an interest rate about half that of private money-lenders, could have provided manageable financing for the Williams family.

Then NSF went to work.

It took 18 months.

NSF helped Mr. Williams appeal twice from the local FHA office to the state director.

NSF helped him to appeal from the state director to the federal administrator of FHA.

Most small farmers need technical assistance like this. They may (or may not) know enough about government programs to go to the county agent or the FHA the first time. But they are easily defeated by a "no" answer, or by complicated forms and financial projections. This is particularly true of Negro farmers in the southern states, who have often found local agencies unfriendly.

Finally, in spring, 1965 (after many appeals to Washington), Mr. Williams received an FHA loan for $15,436 with forty years to pay at 4 per cent interest. The money was to be used to build a modern home for the family at a cost of $6000; to purchase additional farm equipment; and to finance farming operations for the year 1965.

All this has been done.

Here is the Williams' new home.

1965 was the best year Mr. Williams has had for a long time. His farm income increased to $5226, from these sources:

27 bales of cotton	$3780
250 bushels of corn	313
120 bushels of soy beans	282
1 acre of tobacco	500
assistance to others with tractor	351

After paying current bills and making the annual payment on the new FHA loan, the Williams family had left a net income of $2540.

For a family of five, this is still beneath the poverty level. But for the Williams family, hardworking and used to life at a subsistence level, it has meant the dignity of a comfortable home of their own, freedom from the once-constant fear of dispossession, confidence that the corner has been turned and that life will be better.

THE STORY of Mr. Williams is ...An example to give hope to thousands of other small farmers that they need not be driven from the land.

...A stimulus to government agencies to look a little deeper and help a little harder—and a little sooner!—because self-sufficient farmers will repay their debts many times over, adding to the wealth of the community rather than becoming a burden upon it.

...An illustration for NSF contributors of the life-saving work that their aid makes possible.

HERE is another NSF field representative, in another state — Mississippi this time—working to help small farmers to help themselves. Here a group is discussing the organization of a rural cooperative.

These are two of our most important activities:

*helping farmers to secure loans to improve their incomes and their living conditions.

*helping farmers to organize cooperatives for their mutual advantage.

THE LIST of NSF work in and for rural areas is long:

organizing state conferences for the rural poor;*

helping rural people to organize to take advantage of assistance available under the Economic Opportunity Act and other government programs;*

bringing manpower training (including education for the illiterate) to rural areas through NSF's Southern Rural Training Project;*

helping to raise standards for domestic farm workers, to find them jobs, and to eliminate cheap imported contract labor;*

keeping the public and Congress informed about all issues relating to the welfare of the rural poor.*

Still the Excluded

The abysmally low state of farm wages is indicated again in the annual report of the National Sharecroppers Fund, which for thirty years has been seeking to awaken the nation to the indignities of life for those who harvest America's crops. The report shows that farm workers got in 1965 their largest one-year wage increase since the Korean war; the result was to inch up their average pay from $1.08 an hour to $1.14. More than one-third earned less than 75 cents an hour; in the South 54 per cent were in that category.

These wretchedly low wages help explain why organized labor is extending from California to Florida its drive to unionize migrant farm laborers. More than 100,000 migrants start working their way up the Atlantic Coast from southern Florida each spring; their earnings average $1,312 a year—just a little over one-third of the sum the Federal Government considers the dividing line for poverty. The minimum wage bill currently before Congress, which the House passed yesterday, will provide a small beginning toward putting a Federal floor under the wages of those excluded workers, but more than half will remain without any statutory protection. The world's best-fed people are still shamefully neglecting the welfare of the workers who gather their fruits and vegetables.

New York Post

May 24, 1966

The Forgotten

Few of us who dwell in the city know much of the grim existence of the migrant farm laborer; such information as we do possess comes largely from the annual reports to the board of the National Sharecroppers Fund by its executive director, Fay Bennett.

The city housewife out shopping probably makes little connection between farm and city problems. A point in Miss Bennett's report will be of interest to her: cuts in production quotas, harvesting automation and rural race discrimination are forcing migration from farm to city of some 1,000,000 persons annually. They move from rural squalor to urban ghettoes; most are untrained and cannot profit from the new environment. The additional welfare load is proportionately great.

The NSF's legislative program for migrant farm workers may not arouse the impassioned interest of the urban housewife and her husband. But there are two contributions they can make, especially if the husband is a trade union member.

They can urge their Congressman to vote for legislation now before the House which would extend minimum wage coverage to some 400,000 migrants. And they can, through unions, express their support for the new AFL-CIO campaign now under way to organize farm workers in Eastern states.

Re: NSF/RAP staff meeting, October 5 - 7, 1966

You cannot say that I am not keeping you supplied with important reading and studying material which you will find useful in your work, and also in preparation for our coming Atlanta staff meeting. I am now enclosing a 3-page popular report on our 2-year Southern Rural Training Project which ended this summer. If you haven't read the full report yet, I do hope you will read this brief summary, which, while factual, has a more personal touch.

Also enclosed is our most recent brochure, "Panola Builds a Co-op," which tells about the various farmer co-operatives we have helped to organize in Mississippi, Tennessee, and South Carolina.

I do hope that all of you, especially the field staff, will plan to stay through all of the sessions so that you do not miss any of the important discussions and program planning which will be presented by Walt Sharp, Jac Wasserman, Mike Kenney and others. If any of the field men have business to take care of with government officials, they should plan to go in a day earlier rather than to miss any of our important staff workshops.

I look forward to seeing you in the coming week at Atlanta.

Striking Poverty at its Source -- in Rural America

A Report on the Southern Rural Training Project from
National Sharecroppers Fund, 112 East 19th Street, New York, N.Y. 10003

> When graduates of a pilot farm management program in Tennessee were asked by the Employment Service if they would now take a job in town, each program graduate answered, "No."
> The average net farm income of these trainees before the program had been $343 for the year. After training, in 1964, it was $1,285; and the program graduates knew it would continue to increase as they put into operation farm plans and techniques they had learned. Fourteen of the 19 trainees who finished the course increased their incomes by more than 100 per cent. They had found a way out of poverty at home, where they wanted to stay.

Here are the basic facts on rural poverty which point to the significance of this pilot project and the work of the Southern Rural Training Project.

Half of all the poverty in the United States is in rural areas. And, over all, between one-third and one-half of current unemployment has been attributed to the number of workers forced out of agriculture since 1953. Between 1947 and 1964, the number of farms dropped 40 per cent, to 3.5 million, while the number of people working on farms dropped 41 per cent, to 6.1 million.

In the South, Negroes are usually first to go, because their hold on the land is weaker. The South lost 3.3 million nonwhites between 1940 and 1963. But for every Negro displaced, two whites are also displaced. This is far more than a racial problem. And so long as millions of unskilled rural people migrate to cities looking for jobs which no longer exist for the under-educated and untrained, urban poverty will not be eradicated.

"Surplus" People

Mechanization of agriculture is the root of the problem, but neglect and discrimination have also caused the small farmer to be by-passed by economic programs benefiting large farmers. Fewer jobs are available for farm workers, and more skill is required for most of them--handling machinery and chemicals, for instance. Small farmers who cannot afford the new techniques cannot compete successfully with their larger neighbors and are bought out as the big grow bigger. Tenants and sharecroppers are evicted as uneconomic burdens; they become day laborers or migrants, fighting for jobs that are disappearing.

As both the numbers and the incomes of small farmers and farm workers drop sharply, the small rural communities decline with them. There is not enough purchasing power to maintain the small stores, service stations, eating places, country banks. Whole areas stagnate, and then even residents of small towns start to migrate to the swollen ghettos.

Why a Southern Rural Training Project?

The Southern Rural Training Project (SRTP) became an effective effort to reach these hardest to reach of all people, living in poverty-stricken rural areas, without education, technical skills, or indeed anything but the desire to better their lives. The SRTP was set up by the National Sharecroppers Fund in 1964 and was financed by the Department of Labor as an Experimental and Demonstration Project under the Manpower Development and Training Act.

The services and technical assistance of a private agency such as NSF, with its Southern Rural Training Project, provided the bridge between legislation and need. Many of the poorest rural people do not know where and how to find the government agencies that can help; how to interpret legislation to see what is available; how to fill out intricate forms and follow through bureaucratic channels to success--although they have shown that they can learn.

The first year's experience showed the wide variety of needs that such a program could meet. The project served as a middleman, assisting local groups and institutions in understanding the programs that were available, helping them to survey their areas and to draw up the programs they needed, and putting them in touch with all the government agencies that had to be involved. Processing and clearances sometimes took as long as a year, and local people had to be kept aware of what was happening. People without previous experience in dealing with government programs would have been quickly frustrated.

What Is a Training Program?

Although training programs vary a great deal, depending on the area, the participants, and the objectives, they ordinarily comprise three components. First comes basic education in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and basic social education in health and hygiene, citizenship, how to apply for a job. Second comes training, whether in a classroom, on one's own farm with expert supervision, or on-the-job at a new place of employment. Third is the sphere of community action, which has two sides: supportive services for trainees (counseling, health examinations, and the like); and involvement of the program participants in the planning and running of the program, along with other concerned community people.

Programs Developed

Among the early projects developed by SRTP were one to train sugar cane workers in the use of farm machinery; another to train rural young people as secretaries; a third to train small farmers in farm management. One project was also used to test selection techniques; another to test methods of teach-adult literacy.

In its second year, the Southern Rural Training Project broadened its approach to program development, helping local groups apply for and secure training programs under the Economic Opportunity Act and the Vocational Education Act of 1963, as well as under the Manpower Development and Training Act. It broke new ground in Louisiana, Georgia, and Tennessee, where the first funded programs under Title III-B of the Economic Opportunity Act (programs for seasonal farm workers) were developed with the assistance of the Southern Rural Training Project.

Title III-B offered an opportunity for SRTP field staff to encourage indigenous people to take an uncustomary active part in the planning and processing of projects. One participant commented:

> I think that the most significant factor of the meeting tonight was that the seasonal farm workers could sit and discuss a training program with the "big" farmers. I don't think some of the persons attending have ever before participated in a meeting of Negroes and whites similar to this one.

During the second year, SRTP helped local leadership in Southern communities to secure funding for 12 programs which are now providing this kind of education and training for more than 2,100 low-income adults. And 16 additional projects, which will serve 3,000 more trainees, are ready for 1967 funding. This was accomplished at a cost per trainee of $30 to $70, depending on how many projects finally become operative.

Interest is High

From one of the poorest counties in the nation (Fayette, Tennessee), the local training project head wrote:

> Our school has been in operation for three weeks. We have separated the school attendants into three levels of learning. The highest level (consisting of 16 people) is just barely functional. The balance, about equally divided, are illiterate completely to barely being able to read. All of these people at one time had some skill in reading and writing, but through non-use this has been lost.... The interest among the students is high and the enthusiasm of the teachers is very high.

SRTP is a Success

SRTP completed its activities in July. It was an Experimental and Demonstration project which was clearly successful; nevertheless, the Department of Labor's policy is not to continue to finance demonstration projects beyond a second year. The local people who have been aided to plan and follow through on projects have learned how to carry on. But, despite the number of training projects in existence under all of the legislation that SRTP used, still unmet are the needs of thousands of "surplus" people in the rural South, anxious to help themselves if the tools and techniques are offered.

Still Needed

The National Sharecroppers Fund is determined to continue its pioneering work to help poor rural communities receive the benefits of educational and training programs which they desperately need. To this end, one of the most able of the SRTP field representatives has been added to NSF's Regional staff and is now at work with rural communities in several Southern states.

Thus, many more thousands of functional illiterates will begin to read, to learn skills, to find jobs, to open a door out of poverty. But to be truly effective in helping the rural poor to achieve a life of economic independence at home, and in helping to rebuild their impoverished communities, government and private agencies must greatly increase their efforts beyond their present level. NSF is working to bring this about.

Panola Builds a Co-op

Panola Builds a Co-op

Negro farmers in Panola County, Mississippi, were being paid only four cents a pound for their okra. They knew their okra was worth more. The broker to whom they sold their crop, and who was making a handsome profit, wouldn't pay. What did the farmers do? They organized their own co-op to market their own okra. This is the story of how they did it with hard work, determination to succeed, and technical assistance from the National Sharecroppers Fund.

Poverty has been the way of life for generations in Panola County, Mississippi. Nearly 29,000 people lived there when the 1960 census was taken, about 9,000 less than the previous census. More than half of them are Negroes, and nearly all of them are poor farmers. The one out of four—black and white, men and women—who left Panola County forever included more than half of the young people in their twenties.

As everywhere, in Panola the Negroes were harder pressed, poorer, more apt to be forced off their land or to lose their jobs. As more of them left, the thousands who remained wondered if they should—or could—go too. This is the source of the great migration to the cities of people who are untrained, without resources, still hoping to share in the American dream.

Like most of Mississippi, Panola is cotton country. And like many other southern counties, it grows okra and beans on the side. Cotton is so much the center of life that until last year children attended school on a split shift, with classes in the summer so they would be available for picking cotton at the midwinter harvest. Even small independent farmers had little control over their livelihood because they depended on a few local white brokers for pricing and marketing their crops, and they had to take what they were offered in order to get any cash at all.

Farmers Ask Help From NSF

The National Sharecroppers Fund first heard from the small okra farmers of Panola County in the summer of 1964. They asked NSF's field representative, Mr. James Mays, to come and advise them. Civil rights workers in the county had told them about cooperatives, and they asked him to help them start one.

These farmers were being paid only 4 cents a pound by the broker for their okra. When 60 of them signed a petition to the white okra buyer asking for 8 cents (and hoping for 5 or 6 cents), he told them not to try to run his business.

The farmers thought that trying to make a living was as much their business as making a big profit was the broker's business, and they decided to take the risk of trying to sell their okra for themselves. Mr. Mays helped them to get started, but they learned most by doing. Before long, they had formed the beginnings of a farmers' marketing cooperative.

The Farmers Begin

First, they learned how to buy seed wholesale and sell it to co-op members at cost, so that everybody saved. Then they learned that okra has to be graded before it can be marketed, that it has to be a certain size and shape.

When the co-op started, the farmers had to sell their okra on the open market in Memphis, Tennessee, because they had no contract for the crop. One day they might get 6½ cents a pound, and another day only 2 cents. That was because they started late in the season, and because their former buyer worked hard to prevent their getting contracts.

They decided to hold back 1 cent a pound from each member grower's sales to pay for the trucks the co-op had to hire to take the okra to Memphis, and for other expenses. The manager who kept the records and supervised the loading station didn't always get paid his $35.00 a week.

Some farmers went back to the old broker when the co-op had to cut its payments to 4 cents a pound at the end of the summer, but most of them stuck with their co-op. They knew next year would be easier because they now had experience in grading and marketing, and they had time to get contracts with out-of-state buyers and frozen food plants. With these new buyers, they could contract for other crops, too. If they could manage to buy their own trucks, they could save money there.

The Government Should Help

Both the National Sharecroppers Fund and the civil rights workers had told the farmers that they were entitled to government help that they hadn't been getting. The Extension Service could give them information about grading and marketing, and even help get them contracts. Other agencies could lend them money to buy trucks and equipment they needed.

Now that the West Batesville Farmers Cooperative was organized, the farmers had a way to tackle other problems. None of them could afford to buy machinery alone, but through the co-op they could share the expense. The first thing they wanted was cotton harvesters, so that their children could go to school instead of picking the crops after the split-session law was changed. They found out that the poverty program could lend money to a farmers' co-op if more than half the members were poor, but when they first went to the local Farmers Home Administration office the agent didn't seem to know about it.

The co-op filed an application anyway, asking for two cotton pickers, two bean combines, and a bulldozer. They also needed funds for an equipment shed and an office.

Then the county agent came to a co-op meeting and was very discouraging. He said the farmers were asking for too much and told them to take a survey of how many acres of cotton and beans they would be harvesting. The farmers took time off to make the survey and raised money to buy gasoline to get around the county. They found that farmers who wanted to hire the machines the co-op would buy had a total of 1,400 acres of cotton and 1,400 acres of beans. The county agent had to admit that they needed more than they had asked for—six cotton pickers instead of two, and three combines.

The Loan Comes

In August, 1965, the co-op received a loan for $113,000 under the antipoverty program. They had ten years to pay, at about half the interest that was charged locally. It was the largest loan yet made to such a co-op, and all of a sudden local officials who had never done anything for the farmers became interested and even bragged about their achievement.

Now members are being trained to operate and take care of the machinery, and they are talking hopefully about the day they'll have their own cotton gin. Even though it was late summer before the loan came, they were able to make the 1965 payment on it. The drivers were paid $1.25 an hour, which big Mississippi plantation owners still claim they can't afford. Dealers are bidding for the co-op's business, and contracts for 1966 crops were signed in time. Plans are to start handling fertilizer, insecticides, and farm equipment soon.

The farmers' children are going to school now, instead of working in the fields. Some of the farmers are going to classes too, after work is done. With a special foundation grant, a young civil rights worker wrote the story of the co-op in language that people without much education can understand, in print large enough for easy reading, and with pictures that help to tell the story. This is part of a literacy program, and it also helps to spread the word about how to form a co-op.

The West Batesville Farmers Cooperative is a beginning for Panola County. The South is full of counties like Panola where people are being driven out; yet thousands want to stay—if they can get help to build a better life where they are.

Before Panola—and After

The National Sharecroppers Fund has been helping low-income farmers and farm workers in the rural South for nearly thirty years. It brings information about agricultural assistance programs to rural people who need them, and it helps poor people to organize to take advantage of the antipoverty program and to implement the Civil Rights Act so that all may share in benefits.

NSF's first southern field represenative went into Fayette and Haywood Counties, in Tennessee, after hundreds of sharecroppers had been evicted because they registered to vote in 1960. Today, with NSF representative Art Emery as a moving spirit, farmers there have organized the MidSouth Oil Cooperative with a $49,000 loan through the Office of Economic Opportunity. A vegetable marketing cooperative and a credit union are in the planning stages, and another NSF program, the Southern Rural Training Project, is helping the local people get manpower training started there. Small machinery co-ops have been organized, too.

The very first OEO loan to go to a rural cooperative went to the Southern Consumers Cooperative in Lafayette, Louisiana. A delegate from the co-op had attended NSF's first Southern Conference (in North Carolina, in 1962) which brought government and rural people together to learn from each other. The next such conference, in South Carolina in 1963, was specifically about co-operatives, and more than 200 rural people attended. In the following years, similar meetings were held in Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama.

Poor farmers took home ideas of what they could do themselves (such as forming co-ops) and how the government could help (through loan and training programs). NSF added field representatives to follow up with help; those in South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida work in a Rural Advancement Program jointly sponsored by NSF and the Southern Regional Council and the state Councils on Human Relations. In South Carolina, NSF representative L. S. James was credited with key assistance in forming the St. Mathews Machinery Association, which secured the first loan in the state for such a co-op.

Co-op member Mrs. Turner in her okra field

Equipment bought with government loan

Now small co-ops are beginning to multiply throughout the rural South: machinery co-ops, marketing co-ops, even producers' co-ops. The idea is outrunning the know-how, but not the need. Members must learn not only to run machines but to keep books; to understand market conditions as well as soil potential; what they can ask from government, and what they must give of themselves.

The way out of poverty is long and difficult. Guideposts, like NSF, help show the way. But the poor are on the move, and there will be no turning back.

I think all of us feel that our last NSF/RAP workshop in Atlanta, October 5-7, was one of the best we have had, and yet I think we all agree that there is room for improvement. We are all involved in the job of tackling tremendously difficult problems and it will need very careful planning so that the next workshop makes possible the presentation of as much factual information as possible on how to develop economic programs to help the local groups with whom we work; to permit full discussion on the part of all of the staff members on the problems they face in their areas and to raise all of the questions and say all of the relevant things they have on their minds. Spending a full three days at our next workshop as agreed upon will help.

As you will recall, we have accepted James Mays' invitation to hold our next workshop close enough to the Mississippi Delta so that we can spend an afternoon visiting the Panola County Farmers Co-op and to meet with its leaders that evening. When details of the meeting are worked out, you will hear about them directly from Jac Wasserman.

I enclose for your information a reprint on "'Black Power' and Coalition Politics" by Bayard Rustin which I am sure will be of interest to you.

Also enclosed, is a copy of the telegram sent by a representative group of those who attended our last Atlanta workshop to President Johnson and Sargent Shriver regarding the Child Development Group in Mississippi. Much has happened since then. Briefly, the Citizen's Crusade Against Poverty held an emergency Executive Committee meeting on the matter on October 10 (attended by Dr. Frank Graham and myself for NSF). It unanimously adopted the report of a distinguished panel of experts which gave CDGM a clean bill of health all down the line and urged its refunding. CCAP tried to use its influence to get OEO to hold up giving out Head Start money to newly set-up groups and to continue CDGM for another thirty days while the matter was being resolved. Things moved so fast that within a few days a special National Citizens Committee for the Child Development Program in Mississippi was formed and placed a full page ad in the New York Times on Wednesday, October 19th. (Enclosed is a copy). Enclosed also is Sargent Shriver's reply which appeared in the New York Times, the latest exchange on all this in the current issue of New Republic, and an excellent analysis of this struggle by James Wechsler in the New York Post.

THE UNDERSIGNED REPRESENT A WIDE VARIETY OF ORGANIZATIONS AND PROGRAMS TO AID THE SOUTHERN RURAL POOR. IN OUR PRESENT MEETING TO DISCUSS THE PROBLEMS OF SOUTHERN RURAL POVERTY, WE FIND OUSELVES DEEPLY DISTURBED TO LEARN OF THE REFUSAL OF THE OFFICE OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY TO CONTINUE UNRESTRICTED THE WIDELY ACCLAIMED AND EFFECTIVE EFFORTS OF THE CHILD DEVELOPMENT GROUP OF MISSISSIPPI TO BRING PRE-SCHOOL EDUCATION TO THOUSANDS OF THE MOST SEVERELY IMPOVERISHED CHILDREN IN THE COUNTRY AND MEANINGFUL EMPLOYMENT TO HUNDREDS OF THEIR PARENTS. THE GREAT HOPE BROUGHT BY CDGM TO THIS POOR POPULATION IS IN CONTRAST TO OTHER ANTIPOVERTY PROGRAMS WHICH DO NOT TRULY INVOLVE NOR GIVE GENUINE AID AND HOPE TO THE RURAL POOR IN MISSISSIPPI.

WE STRONGLY URGE YOUR CONTINUATION OF THE PIONEERING WORK OF CDGM. ITS DISCONTINUATION WOULD BE A SIGNIFICANT STEP BACKWARDS FOR HEAD START AND WOULD BRING DEEP FRUSTRATION AND DESPAIR TO THE MILLIONS OF POOR PERSONS THROUGHOUT THE NATION WHOSE HOPES HAVE BEEN RENEWED BY THE

AGENCY STATEMENT OF NEEDS, PROGRAM AND ORGANIZATION

Human Needs Served

The Assembly is the one national planning and coordinating agency for the social welfare field. Through involvement of national-state-local, public-voluntary, and lay-professional interests, The Assembly gives leadership in bringing about adaptive change in purposes, programs, and structures within the social welfare field, and in encouraging innovation in meeting needs and trends. The Assembly also takes leadership in shaping new relationships with other interests concerned with human well-being, including housing, education, government, business, labor, social sciences, and economic and physical planning.

What the Agency Does

In pursuing these goals The Assembly is committed to the following priorities: Advancing social and economic well-being; achieving new, dynamic, and inclusive approaches to planning; and furthering the realization of equal rights and full access to opportunities and services. Working together on this program are 36 standing committees, conferences, and workshops on which over 1,500 different individuals serve. The Assembly:

a. Studies problems and programs of current and coming import which vitally affect the entire field of social welfare. For example, the place of voluntary social welfare in today's world and how it is to be financed; ways organizations can open full opportunities for Negroes; changing relationships between governmental and voluntary agencies; social welfare needs of the armed services and veterans; selection, training and differential use of staff with and without professional education; automation and leisure; executive responsibility for long range development plans; legal entitlements under welfare laws.

b. Influences public social policy of governmental and voluntary organizations through: Analyzing and evaluating programs, needs, and trends; working with key persons in the agencies; adopting official positions developed in consultation with national organizations, state and local planning councils, and social welfare statesmen; preparing and distributing information bulletins and guidelines.

c. Speaks in behalf of voluntary social welfare. Presents point of view of voluntary social welfare for incorporation into the U.S. position on matters before the U.N. Social Commission; prepares report on voluntary services for U.S. report to the U.N.; presents organized young adult interests in national and international affairs through U.S. Youth Council; testifies before committees of Congress in its own name and by request on behalf of local, state, and national agencies and individuals. By agreement with United Community Funds and Councils of America, The Assembly is the national spokesman for social welfare planning, and serves as liaison to state and local welfare councils on national developments.

d. Develops guides for agency programs and policies. For example, how to use volunteers in poverty programs; how to determine fees for service; what to consider in choosing a campsite; personnel matters; salaries; uses of confidential information; what teenagers can do about human rights. With UCFCA cosponsors the National Budget and Consultation Committee. Standards of Accounting and Financial Reporting for Voluntary Health and Welfare Organizations were developed in a joint project with the National Health Council.

Organization

History. Created in 1945 to meet the demand for a central national planning and coordinating agency in the social welfare field.

Governing Bodies. The Assembly, the corporate authority, elects 158 members named by the 79 affiliate and associate organizations and 117 members-at-large, also The Assembly officers and Board of 36 who serve 3-year terms. Chairmen of standing units are ex officio Board members. In 1965, The Assembly met twice; average attendance 200. The Board met 4 times; average attendance 24.

Officers. Board: Chairman, Winslow Carlton; Vice Chairmen: Robert F. Shea, Sanford Solender; Secretary: C.F. McNeil. The Assembly: President, William H. Bulkeley; Vice Presidents: Margaret Hickey, R. Wolcott Hooker, John F. Meloney, Chester McKittrick, Leo Perlis, Mrs. Alexander B. Ripley, Ira A. Schur; Secretary, Mrs. Michael Harris; Treasurer, Eugene J. Patton.

HIGHLIGHTS OF PROGRAM

The Assembly in 1966 will continue its regular on-going activities; will complete the special Study of Future Role and Program begun in 1965; will work further on implementation of uniform accounting and financial reporting; and will give special attention to four major areas: 1) Anti-poverty programs. 2) Extending and strengthening relationships with departments and agencies of the Federal government. 3) Governmental and voluntary agency relationships, roles and responsibilities. 4) Financing national voluntary organizations. During 1966, adaptations in the structure and work of Assembly units will be made as the special study progresses, if change is indicated.

The paragraphs which follow report selected program highlights.

Future Role and Program

The special Study of the Future Role and Program of the National Social Welfare Assembly, begun in September of 1965, will be completed in 1966. The study will: 1) Analyze and evaluate national issues and problems affecting the well-being of people; 2) assess the purpose, nature, and extent of The Assembly's role in the light of these problems; 3) project attainable program goals; and 4) convert program goals into recommendations covering organization, management, and financing.

The scope of the study includes: 1) Factual assessment of The Assembly over the past ten years with respect to trends in financing, staffing, workload, participation in program, and program emphases and priorities; 2) identification and broad evaluation of social welfare problems and issues requiring national study, planning, coordination and leadership for solution; 3) assessment of the nature, role, and utility of The Assembly, its present image, the utility of its materials; 4) identification of means by which to further working relationships with the Federal government, and with other national organizations of similar interests; 5) identification of the methods for improving and strengthening working liaison with local and state social welfare planning councils; and 6) identification of means by which working relationships can be extended and strengthened with organizations and groups whose interests touch upon social welfare.

The study plan calls for individual and group conferences with lay and professional leaders in social welfare and related disciplines. Care is being taken to have the views of united fund and community welfare councils as well as those of national voluntary and governmental bodies. A series of five regional conferences assures geographically wide-spread participation.

The study committee of 18 members includes business, education, labor, government, religion, and social welfare interests. Bernard L. Gladieux, Vice President of the management firm of Booz, Allen & Hamilton, is committee chairman; Mrs. H. M. Rozendaal, citizen leader of Schenectady, New York is vice chairman. Greenleigh Associates are consultants to the committee. The study is financed by The Rockefeller Foundation with matching money from individuals, and national organizations affiliated with The Assembly.

Standards of Accounting and Financial Reporting for Voluntary Health and Welfare Organizations

Implementation of the Standards, developed jointly by The Assembly and the National Health Council is proceeding so that agencies may make their first report by these Standards before or during 1968. The program includes work with the national agencies, with united funds and with regulatory bodies. June 30, 1966 has been set as the deadline date for completion of national agency manuals and those of their local units. United Community Funds and Councils of America is developing a new budget manual for use by local united funds and chests. Technical assistance in the implementation program is by Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co.

A handbook, Forms and Instructions Recommended to State and Local Regulatory Bodies for Uniform Financial Reporting by Voluntary Health and Welfare Organizations, has been completed. Its contents were developed in cooperation with voluntary agencies, state and local regulatory bodies and other public officials. This handbook will be distributed in cooperation with the National Association of Attorneys General and the National League of Cities.

These three approaches - with the agencies, united funds, and regulatory bodies - encompass the major facets of reporting. This means that, when completed, a national or a local agency can use one set of reports for all purposes requiring reports of income, expenditures, and assets, and the relationship of these items to program and management costs. The reports will also provide means for financial comparisons among agencies.

War on Poverty

Historically The Assembly is committed to advancing the well-being of all people, a commitment which was reaffirmed on April 10, 1964 with the adoption of an official Position Statement on the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. In 1966, The Assembly will give particular attention to the war on poverty. The Assembly will: 1) Continue to emphasize the role of social welfare in fighting poverty, and will recognize that both innovative and established programs are essential. 2) Help define appropriate roles for governmental and for voluntary agencies. 3) Gather information about the experience of national agencies and local units. 4) Examine how such experience relates to and affects agencies' on-going purposes and programs. 5) Identify in what places and ways the established agencies may make their best contributions to the poverty fight. 6) Against this background, seek to develop common understanding and agreement with the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity.

Relationships with United Community Funds and Councils of America

The Assembly and the UCFCA work closely together in ways appropriate to advance planning and coordination in social welfare. A statement of agreement, adopted by the two boards in 1964, recognizes The Assembly responsibility for overall planning in the social welfare field, for keeping abreast of Federal and national developments and for dealing directly with welfare planning councils on such developments. UCFCA continues its responsibility for giving leadership, consultation, and service to local funds and councils, and for keeping abreast of local voluntary and governmental planning matters.

With UCFCA, The Assembly co-sponsors the National Budget and Consultation Committee, and two annual regional meetings - the Great Lakes Institute and the Adirondack Workshop.

Governmental and Voluntary Responsibilities

Plans have been drawn for initiating a dialogue to assess the dramatic changes which are taking place in governmental and voluntary responsibilities and relationships in the health and welfare fields, and to consider and define the respective roles of government and voluntary effort in the coming years. This dialogue, jointly undertaken by the National Health Council and The Assembly, is seen as a continuing process, for such matters are not static. Funds are being sought for an initial group to be brought together in 1966.

Social Issues and Policies

Committees of Congress, public bodies, national organizations and local community welfare councils look to The Assembly for advice, consultation, and information on matters of public social policy. The Assembly speaks for itself on those matters for which an official position has been taken. By request The Assembly speaks on public issues for other organizations and individuals. For example, in 1965 The Assembly testified on unemployment insurance before the House Ways and Means Committee on behalf of 23 organizations and 64 executives. Of these, 10 organizations were local funds or councils and 42 individuals were executives of local funds or councils. The Assembly filed separate statements for three national organizations, and for the Record introduced an Assembly study on unemployment insurance.

Individual consultation has been given to national organizations on specific issues, such as, Federal aid for social work education, and implementation of medicare as it affects visiting nurses and united funds. At the request of the D/HEW Task Force on Social Work Education and Manpower, members of The Assembly Committee on Personnel met with the Task Force staff for consultation regarding needed legislation.

Members of Congress and public officials have been warm in their praise for this aspect of The Assembly work.

Legal Rights of Persons Entitled to Public Benefits and Welfare Protections

The question of legal entitlements and protections under welfare programs is a growing interest of The Assembly. In 1959, The Assembly took the lead in examining the issues around a newly passed Louisiana law which disqualified over 22,000 children for Aid to Dependent Children. A number of national agencies, acting under Assembly sponsorship, petitioned the Social Security Commissioner to call a hearing to determine whether or not the Louisiana action was not in fact out of conformity with Federal law. When the hearing was called national organizations singly and jointly filed amicus curiae briefs on behalf of the Louisiana children. As a result of this action Federal regulations were modified, and subsequently incorporated into law, making it impossible to deny assistance to an otherwise eligible child because of the unsuitability of the home, unless other provisions are made for support of the child.

Legal and social welfare interests have been further stimulated by Assembly publications. For example, Poverty and the Law (1963), which discusses the constitutional rights of public assistance recipients, and Check List of Legal and Constitutional Issues affecting the rights of individuals seeking or receiving welfare and related benefits (1965). Elizabeth Wickenden, The Assembly Consultant on Public Social Policy, has spearheaded these efforts which have involved others also. For example, the Yalw Law Journal in June of 1963 published Midnight Welfare Searches and the Social Security Act, and in June 1965 carried Individual Rights and Social Welfare: The Emerging Legal Issues. Both articles were by Charles I. Reich, Esq. The Assembly, through special financing, gave wide distribution to the 1963 article. Miss Wickenden has secured a grant for an exploratory examination of the legal issues through a project now underway at the Hays Center of the New York University Law School.

Continuing attention will be given to this significant area in the coming months.

Social Welfare and Community Mental Health

A seminar on social welfare and community mental health will be held in March of 1966 under the joint sponsorship of The Assembly and the National Health Council and with the aid of a grant from the National Institute of Mental Health. The purpose of the seminar is to bring together national, state and local, voluntary and governmental service and planning agencies to develop ways to gain the objectives of the Community Mental Health Act of 1963. The seminar proceeds on the assumption that it is necessary to replace the walls between systems of service in the states and communities with bridges of understanding and cooperation. It is hoped that answers will be found to problems of financing, fragmentation, and growing demands for a variety of new kinds of services.

This seminar may well provide a pattern for exploration into other important program areas involving a variety of community interests.

Relationships with the United Nations

Voluntary social welfare's point of view on issues to come before the United Nations Social Commission is developed and presented by The Assembly Committee on International Social Welfare. In preparation for the 1965 meeting of the Commission, agenda items were analyzed, comments and recommendations prepared dealing with: 1) family, child, and youth welfare services; 2) relationship between social security and social services; 3) training of social welfare personnel; 4) reappraisal of the United Nations Social Service Programme; 5) the social aspects of housing and urban development; 6) proposals for the programme of work of the U.N. in the social field 1965-1967. These papers, issued as an Assembly publication, have had wide use. Mrs. Edison Dick, then U.S. Representative to the U.N. Social Commission, expressed "warmest appreciation ... for the help and guidance given by the thoughtful position papers of the National Social Welfare Assembly." She added: "It is a great satisfaction to a delegation to have the back stopping of such an interested and informed group."

The U.S. representatives to the UNICEF Board have requested similar help in 1966.

International Development

Social welfare services are constructive and necessary measures to advance, support and sustain the total society is the central message of a Position Statement on Social Welfare in International Development, adopted by The Assembly on March 12, 1965. The principles set forth in this statement will guide The Assembly's future relationships in both governmental and non-governmental international development interests.

International Conferences

United States participation in the Fifth Pan American Congress of Social Service was sponsored by The Assembly Committee on International Social Welfare. There were 19 on the U.S. delegation to the Congress which met in Lima, Peru in November of 1965. The Assembly Committee was responsible for the preparation of the U.S. position paper on the theme: Social Welfare's Role in Mobilization and Administration of Human Resources in Social Development.

The Assembly is joining with other national organizations in plans for the 1966 International Conference of Social Work which meets in Washington, D. C. in September.

International Exchange

Local communities have the privilege of learning first hand about social welfare interests and services in other countries through the International Exchange Program, which is financed by the U.S. Department of State. Under the auspices of this Program, each year several hundred visitors from some 40 to 50 nations study and visit social agencies in the United States. In 1966, some 1,000 individuals will be hosted by IEP with each visitor's program developed by The Assembly's IEP staff. Through The Assembly U.S. Youth Council, friendships across national boundaries are formed which in time will broaden and enrich the lives of young people throughout the world. In 1965, there were small exchange delegations to Cambodia, Latin America and the Caribbean Islands, and from West Germany, Russia, Uganda, Tanganyika, and Vietnam.

Intergroup Relations

A newly constituted Committee on Intergroup Relations will gather information about the programs, problems, and progress of national agencies and will develop recommendations for use by the national agencies and their local constituency.

Financing National Voluntary Agencies

This subject will receive attention in 1966 through an ad hoc committee charged with exploring the 1) problems national voluntary agencies have in securing adequate financial support, 2) current and potential sources of support, and 3) possible solutions. Intimately involved are the changing relationships with government, project money, and fees.

Regional Conferences and Workshops

Regional national organization field staff conferences offer the opportunity for a careful look at problems specific to the region, and for making plans on how best to deal with them. Four regional field staff conferences now meet regularly as part of the program of the Committee on Field Service: Western, Midwestern, Southeastern and Northeastern.

Adirondack Workshop and the Great Lakes Institute, co-sponsored with UCFCA, bring together national, state and local agency executives, both governmental and voluntary, for an exploration of some special problem. In 1966 the topics will be New Federal Legislation-Impact on Local Communities, and The Revolution of Expectations.

National Inter-organizational Relationships in Social Welfare

The Assembly is serving as convener of a group of national agencies meeting to review major changes affecting the social welfare field, and to consider their implications for national functions, programs, organizational structure, etc. within the field. Included are National Association of Social Workers, National Conference on Social Welfare, American Public Welfare Association, Council on Social Work Education.

Individual Staff Members

Individual staff members are called upon from time to time for committee service, for speaking, and for writing assignments. For example, four articles in the 1965 Encyclopedia of Social Work, published by the National Association of Social Workers, were prepared by Assembly staff members: National Organizations in Social Welfare, Robert E. Bondy; Voluntary Organization for Social Welfare, Gordon Manser; Social Action, Elizabeth Wickenden; Financing National Health and Welfare Agencies, Elma Phillipson Cole. The 1965 Yearbook of the U.S. Department of Agriculture included a section on welfare services written by Mrs. Louise N. Mumm.

Miss Wickenden prepared a Chapter on Welfare Services for a book, In Aid of the Unemployed, edited by Joseph M. Becker, S. J., published by The Johns Hopkins Press in 1965. Mrs. Cole prepared a Chapter on Interagency Relations for a 1966 Columbia University book Public Relations in Health and Welfare Management.

Miss Wickenden in 1965 was appointed by the President to membership on the Citizen's Advisory Council on the Status of Women. She was also invited to membership on the National Advisory Committee to the Legal Services Program of the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity. She is a member of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare, charged with reporting in 1966 to Congress and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare on changes needed in the public assistance and child welfare services provisions of the Social Security Act.

Staff members have helped in the development of standards, for example homemaker services, and for accreditation of agencies serving blind persons.

Publications

Publications are an integral part of The Assembly's service to the field. A regular newsletter to the constituency highlights developments. Guides for organizing and operating programs and services are developed with the help of technicians in the related fields. For example, youth work camps, use of case aides, handling confidential case material. Information bulletins are issued analyzing new Federal proposals or laws, or dealing with some critical and emerging problem. For example, taxes, health care for the aged, poverty, youth employment. Occasional papers pertinent to The Assembly's program emphases are issued: integration, poverty. Studies and special directories are prepared: a study of salaries and working conditions in social welfare, titles and definitions of social welfare positions for the Department of Labor Dictionary of Occupational Titles, Service Directory of National Organizations affiliated and associated with The Assembly. In 1965, 20 items were added to The Assembly's Publication List.

NATIONAL SOCIAL WELFARE ASSEMBLY INC.

WILLIAM H. BULKELEY President WINSLOW CARLTON Chairman Board of Directors ROBERT E. BONDY Director

Report of The Treasurer to the 1965 Annual Meeting of The Assembly

Eugene J. Patton

The financial situation within The Assembly has always been reasonably tight. In our first year back in 1946 the income was about $63,000 and our expenses were about $59,000, so in that first year we started off with a surplus of some $4,000. Until 1960 our income has matched our expenses. It had to be that way. In the last four years, however, our expenses exceeded our income and we had to borrow from the banks.

In reporting the financial results of operations of The Assembly for the year 1965, let me say at the outset that on the basis of actual figures for the first ten months of this year and what I consider very reasonable estimates of income and expenses for the months of November and December, we shall not have to go to the bank and borrow as we have had to do at the end of each of the last four years. At the end of 1961 we had to borrow $16,000; 1962 - $21,000; 1963 - $12,500, and 1964 - $18,100.

The 1965 financial results viewed in light of this background are quite commendable, and our retiring director, Robert E. Bondy, and his executive staff should feel proud of their accomplishments this year.

Before going into detail, I also wish to point out and emphasize that in 1961 The Assembly adopted the financial policy that the basic support should come from its own constituency, namely, the affiliated organizations and the United Funds and Welfare Councils. In other words, it was the objective of this policy that The Assembly's own constituency would provide 90% to 95% of the income to defray expenses of operation. An examination of this objective will be discussed later in this report.

A summary of 1965 financial results projected on the cash receipts and disbursements method of accounting is as follows:

Income - 1965

Income - cash receipts	$ 294,300
Bank loan proceeds	None
Total income - cash receipts	$ 294,300

Expense - 1965

Monies actually paid out	$ 291,000
Less: Dec. 1964 loan repaid with interest thereon	18,500
Actual operating disbursements	$ 272,500
Surplus, estimated 12/31/65	$ 3,300

Operating income exceeds operating expenses, on a cash basis, by $21,800 ($294,300 - $272,500). Out of this excess of income over expense, we were able to repay, in 1965, the December 1964 loan and interest thereon of $18,500 leaving an estimated surplus of about $3,300 at year end.

What were the sources of our 1965 income as compared with the four preceding years?

Total Cash Available by Source and Year 1961 - 1965

	1965	1964	1963	1962	1961
Affiliated Organizations	$ 112,800	108,800	103,300	91,400	95,000
United Fund & Community Welfare Councils	114,200	107,500	100,000	101,000	94,300
Contributions	7,600	8,600	8,400	9,500	7,200
Reimbursements	55,300	27,000	36,000	21,800	19,500
Sale of Publications	3,800	3,600	7,600	5,200	8,000
Miscellaneous	600	600	600	600	2,500
	294,300	256,100	255,900	229,500	226,500
Money Borrowed	NONE	18,100	12,500	21,000	16,000
Cash Available	$ 294,300	274,200	268,400	250,500	242,500

Percent of Cash Available by Specified Source Year 1961 - 1965

Affiliated organizations United Funds & Community Welfare Councils	77%	79%	76%	77%	78%
Reimbursements	18.8%	9.8%	13.4%	8.7%	8%

There was a marked increase in income from reimbursements in 1965. Of the $55,300, about 90% came from implementation of the Standards of Accounting and Financial Reporting, The International Exchange Program and the comics project. If it had not been for this substantial amount of reimbursement income we would have had to go to the bank again this year.

We are still striving to increase our income from outside sources. The president is again sending letters soliciting contributions from friends and from individuals.

So much for the income analysis; let us look at our cash disbursements.

Disbursements by Object and Year 1961 - 1965

	1965	1964	1963	1962	1961

Operating expenses	$ 272,500	261,300	246,900	235,300	241,400

This report gives you an idea of the scope of the financial operational aspects of The Assembly. These figures relate to what we call the Operating Budget.

In addition, The Assembly in 1965 will expend $749,000 for special projects including the International Exchange Program which is carried in co-operation with the U.S. Department of State; the U. S. Youth Council, and Standards Implementation Project.

In other words, The Assembly this year is doing a total business involving expenditures of over one million dollars. The accounts have been examined every year by the national accounting firm of Haskins & Sells and have been found to be in order.

These expenditures are under the administration and supervision of a small Assembly administration and program staff. May I say on my behalf and, if I may, on yours that they are doing an excellent job under a tight budget situation. They deserve our highest commendation.

CITIZEN ACTION ASSEMBLY
ON HEALTH & WELFARE SERVICES FOR GEORGIA'S CHILDREN

RESOLUTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS, as follows, were set forth by the participants of the state-wide Citizen Action Assembly on Health and Welfare Services for Georgia's Children, April 1, 1966.

I. In considering welfare services, it is essential that we resolve to be aware and have concern for current programs, problem areas, and proposed changes in programs and legislation.

A. We resolve that the criteria for qualifying to receive Aid for Dependent Children (ADC) be re-evaluated to eliminate the high rigidity of requirements which deprive our children of basic essentials for their normal existence, and that steps be taken to increase the amount of the grants and the number of benefits (services).

B. We particularly recommend that the "substitute father" or "man in the house" clause be removed as a criteria for denying a family the right of assistance.

II. We recommend that the Georgia General Assembly be reconvened for the purpose of using surplus funds to increase health and welfare benefits; and that such benefits include the Georgia Department of Family and Children's Services launching a special project to distribute surplus foods, and that this Department increasingly use the Food Stamp Program as a more effective means of providing food to people in need.

III. We recommend that mandatory legislation be passed which will....

...require all school superintendents in all school districts to establish classes for retarded children, both educable and trainable, and that there be less rigidity in the accreditation of teachers for these special classes and an increase in the training of volunteer aides.

...establish a mechanism to insure the enforcement of child labor laws and practices throughout Georgia.

...insure enforcement of day care requirements at all centers in Georgia.

IV. We resolve that we be an Action Assembly and Committee, concerned with implementing and insuring adequate services towards improving the health and well-being of all children in Georgia, regardless of race, color, or creed.

A. To actively follow-up the groundwork laid by the Citizen Action Assembly:

1. Funds be sought and secured to develop a program which will bring services to those people most in need.

2. Upon receiving of funds, area meetings be held in the State, as the first phase of the Citizen Health and Welfare Program. These meetings will follow, in principle, the goals, purposes, and structuring of the State-wide Assembly.

3. An Advisory Board (Committee) be established to insure the fulfilling of program goals and plans, and that this Board be composed of a third civic leaders, a third representatives of communities in need, and a third professionals from public and private servicing agencies.

B. Upon establishing a state-wide structure, which will be composed of a state-wide committee with an advisory board, and area committees with boards and community delegates, we recommend the following programs:

1. Consultative services (public or private) be secured for community organizations requesting health and/or welfare programs.

2. Leaders of community organizations be encouraged to assist in educating the general public by interpreting health and welfare programs to their membership, encouraging volunteer service in areas of need, and devising means of disseminating information to the community-at-large.

3. Students should become aware of communities with health welfare problems; they should examine (research) services performed by local agencies, and, in general, analyze areas of need--geographical and problematic.

4. Young people should be motivated towards careers in public health and welfare, particularly in those areas in most need of trained personnel.

5. Local action should be taken to establish a community information center which would be responsible for....

   a) developing a community agency inventory for the purpose of coordinating and co-relating existing services and developing those additionally needed;

   b) devising an uptodate fact sheet on existing services and a means of disseminating this information;

   c) actively involving the people receiving services, and in most need of services, in the planning of methods for more efficient dispersing of services and in the planning for additionally needed services.

C. We recommend that, in cooperation with various citizen action groups in Georgia, public and private servicing agencies....

...examine their current procedures for distributing services, and, wherever feasible, devise means for simplifying procedures.

...make home services available or, where such servicing is not feasible, funds be available for those individuals who cannot present themselves to take advantage of services.

...consider decentralization and extension of services to improve the quality and quantity of services for those communities in need.

...provide the assistance of qualified personnel to train volunteers for services needing aides.

V. We resolve that we as individuals and representatives of our organizations will assume the responsibility for taking the above recommendations and resolutions to our respective communities, that we will actively participate in their implementation and in the elimination of all discriminatory practices existing in health and welfare servicing by public and and private agencies in Georgia.

Mr. Paul Anthony, Executive Director
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N.W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Anthony:

This letter comes as an invitation to you and your supervisor to attend a conference on "VISTA Training".

It is scheduled for January 10, 1967 at the Georgian Terrace Hotel, beginning at 12:30 p.m. and running until 4:00 p.m.

Participants will include representatives from social work agencies, and civic organizations of Metropolitan Atlanta. The conference is being co-sponsored by VISTA Washington and the National Urban League, having as cooperating agencies the Community Council of Atlanta Area, Inc,, and Economic Opportunity Atlanta, Inc.

VISTA (Volunteers in Service to America) is one of the programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity, and was established to recruit, train and assign capable volunteers to qualified organizations which are concerned with services to the poor.

Men and women of all ages and from all sections of the country are offered the opportunity to provide full-time volunteer service in a major united effort against the evils of poverty in America. In order to qualify, these volunteers must have the desire and ability to help motivate those caught up in the cycle of poverty. Prior to placement, they must participate in a training program in assignments which prepare them with knowledge and a variety of skills for working within organizational structures to improve the living conditions of deprived people. The E. K. Jones VISTA Training Center of Atlanta was established as one of 14 training centers in the country to accomplish this objective.

This conference will present an over-all view of the total VISTA program, with special emphasis on field training. It is our expectation that your participation will afford you an opportunity to assess the desirability of using VISTA volunteers and Trainees in your agency's work, and of providing field training in cooperation with the E. K. Jones Center.

The conference is planned with the hope that our agency leaders might be better informed about VISTA and will discuss in detail the plans for field training. We hope that you will offer your suggestions and ideas so that together we might provide the kind of training program which will best serve the needs of the trainees and the agencies.

You will find enclosed a form for pre-registration. If additional information is needed, please call Mrs. Margaret Hall, Conference Coordinator, at MU 8-8778.

Very cordially yours,

The Sponsors:

RE: FOLLOW-UP OF CONFERENCE ON
VISTA TRAINING FOR SOCIAL AGENCIES

We appreciate your attendance at the conference on VISTA Training held at the Georgian Terrace Hotel on January 10, 1967. Your questions and ideas were helpful to us in planning future training and we hope that the conference provided some helpful information about VISTA for your agency.

Our next training period begins on January 25, 1967 and we are eager to complete the planning now. We have thought of your agency as one that might provide a good field experience for our trainees. If you cannot consider that at this time, we would appreciate your suggestions for our training program.

Please complete the enclosed questionnaire and return it to the address below. I would welcome any questions or discussion and may be reached at 688-8778.

Dear Mr. Stanfield:

At the time of the State-Wide Citizens Action Assembly on Health and Welfare Services for Georgia's Children in March, 1966, a request was made for a full-time staff member in this office to continue working with the Advisory Committee. We were not authorized to hire such a person until January, 1967. Mrs. Barbara I. Whitaker was appointed Assistant Director, Health and Welfare at that time. We recognize that situations have changed and progress has been made in some of the areas of concern of that Assembly. We are desirous of reviewing the recommendations of the two-day conference to determine the status of the problem areas identified and to assess the feasibility of reactivating the Advisory Committee.

We are asking you and other members of the Advisory Committee to meet with us on Wednesday, May 31, 1967, at 3:00 p.m. here in our office. We hope that it will be possible for you to attend. We recognize the time lag that has occurred since the Assembly, but we would appreciate your co-operation at this time.

Sincerely,

Mr. E. C. McClinton
NAIRO
3100 Maple Drive, N. W., Room 320
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Mr. McClinton:

In our luncheon session with Fred Routh, one of Fred's main concerns was that we should have a city-wide membership drive to encourage inter-group relations officials in Atlanta to become members of National NAIRO.

I would like to suggest that you talk with Ed Stanfield at the Southern Regional Council, whose telephone number is 522-8764, to find out whether he has any information for the number of representatives in government and business in Atlanta, regional and local, who are not now members of NAIRO. If we could secure such a list, I think that a letter of invitation should go to all of them to become members of NAIRO and also to participate in our next meeting, scheduled for early March.

Since we usually meet on the second Monday in each month, I suspect that our program will probably be operational March 11; however, I need to clear this with some of the members of our Atlanta Chapter, prior to a decision on it. In the meantime, if I can prepare a roster of people, who we should contact, I will be glad to pursue this with you.

If you need any assistance on this and wish to move it to April, you may want to write directly to Fred Routh in our Washington Office, to secure from him the necessary materials and information for a successful membership drive for NAIRO.

Let me thank you for your assistance to the local chapter, both in the Model Cities program and in our local activity, and hope that your continuing support will help our local chapter to continue moving in the right direction.

Yours very truly,

K. B. M. Crooks, Jr., Chairman

Here Goes Nothing?

Is a "Field Activities Newsletter" a good idea? We've been toying with the notion for some time and decided to try one or two. We don't know for sure what all we want to put in it, who we want to send it to, how often it should be written, or whether it is worth the effort. But from time to time there are bits of news or good ideas or useful information that we would like to pass on,--mostly to the staffs of the state councils, state council presidents, and perhaps to the SRC Board members and maybe state council staffers can let us know if you would like to select a few others to get it--like members of your Board and/or local council presidents.

New Names and Faces in Tennessee

Among the first new staffers to be employed under the expanded grant-in-aid program are Mr. and Mrs. Harry A. Wiersema, who have joined the staff of the Tennessee Council. Actually, they were not "Mr. and Mrs. Wiersema" until after they started working for the TCHR. Baxton Bryant writes, "The Council has already had a wonderful effect on this fine young couple. Their marriage was performed by me in my home last Saturday." That's a wonderful effect, all right!

Mrs. Wiersema was Jerry Jolene Williams, a twenty-seven year old native Tennessean. She has a B.S. from Middle Tennessee State, where she was in Who's Who in American Universities and Colleges, and lacks her thesis for a Master's in sociology from the University of Tennessee. For the past couple of years she has been working for the Metropolitan Action Commission (Nashville's community action agency) and the State Planning Commission. Her duties included research on poverty in Tennessee, community organization, and preparation of proposals for the poverty program.

Harry was born in Knoxville and is likewise twenty-seven. He holds a B.S. in Mechanical Engineering and also has done work toward a Master's degree in sociology at the university. Before joining the TCHR staff he was Assistant Coordinator of the Neighborhood Youth Corps in Nashville. On the side he is a genius with office equipment and photographic equipment.

Both Harry and Jerry have been active in civil rights,--and there is no denying their commitment. Needless to say, the TCHR could not offer them, finance-and-security-wise, anything like their combined compensation from their former jobs. We don't think they would mind our quoting from a letter they wrote to the TCHR Board in connection with their application:

> ...For some time we have worked in the war on poverty, and we have been disillusioned with the progress made there and in other areas of human relations.
> ****
> We have come to see how much progress toward these ideals can be made by one man who is independent, with the help and support from concerned members of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations.

Personnel Changes in Arkansas

Beginning June 1, Nat Griswold, Executive Director of the Arkansas Council from its beginning, will lay down his accustomed duties to write a book about the Little Rock school crisis. After that he will retire to the family farm. He will be succeeeded as Executive Director by Ozell Sutton, long-time Associate Director of the Council.

Taking Ozell's place as Associate Director will be the Reverend J. Harold Jackson, presently Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of North Little Rock. Harold was born in New Orleans and holds a B.S. degree from L.S.U. and a B.D. degree from Union Theological Seminary in Richmond, Virginia. He has served churches in Jennings, Louisiana, and Helena, Arkansas, besides his present pastorate. He has served for the past year as Moderator of the Synod of Arkansas, Presbyterian Church, U.S. His wife is the former Sarah Wakeman of Baton Rouge. They have three children.

Executive Director for the Louisiana Council

Beginning in June the Louisiana Council will have an Executive Director. The position has been accepted by Mrs. Patricia B. Miller, a resident of Baton Rouge (where the office is to be).

Mrs. Miller grew up in Ohio and did her undergraduate work at West Virginia State College. She took a M.A. degree in Health and Physical Education from the University of Iowa. She has worked for the Urban League in Chicago and as a physical education instructor at Samuel Houston College, West Virginia State, and Southern University For the past nine years she has operated a real estate and contracting business, building (so we are told) some of the loveliest new homes in Baton Rouge and New Orleans.

But Mrs. Miller wanted to help people in a less impersonal way. So she entered the graduate school of Southern University and in June will receive a M.A. degree in Guidance.

Mrs. Miller strikes one as a poised and quietly determined woman. We predict that she will do an outstanding job as Director of the LCHR. And most certainly we wish her well.

Leadership Conferences in Mississippi

Ken Dean of the MCHR has been the prime convener of a couple of meetings which he hopes will get on some sort of regular basis as a Mississippi Leadership Conference. As we get the picture, this is intended to be a Mississippi version of the Southern Interagency Conference.

After discussing the idea with eight or ten of the more active leaders in the areas of race relations and poverty programs, Ken set a date and invited about twenty-five organizations to send representatives. The list included all major civil rights groups, as well as women's organizations and some of the church groups. About 34 people showed up at the first meeting.

The reaction of participants at the initial meeting was good. Besides the obvious sharing of ideas and problems, Ken sees the Leadership Conference as helping to clear up misunderstandings and giving some of the church groups and women's groups contact with the more active civil rights people. Ken thinks this aspect of the idea might be even more fruitful in other states.)

"The most difficult part of this type of program," Ken writes, "is to get an open date."

We are not astonished.

Board, Local Council Leaders Meet in Florida

On May 6 and 7, August VandenBosche brought together his Board and the principal officers of each local council for a conference which included briefing on the financial structure and requirements of the council and program at both the state and local level. Paul Anthony and I went down for this meeting, which was held in Orlando. We felt that it was very helpful toward getting all concerned to "understand the situation." It was also a good way to get a lot of program information and ideas across.

The Arkansas Council is planning a similar meeting for June 10.

A Local Council Program We Like

The Augusta (Georgia) Council on Human Relations has established a listing service for open housing. The plan is to list houses available to be bought, sold, or rented on a non-discriminatory basis. They want only to bring buyer and seller together, of course, and will not be serving as brokers.

The group has secured a small office and a telephone. Volunteers man the phone. A small ad is carried in the classified section from time to time. Besides answering the phone, the volunteers call people who advertise in the paper to see if the unit is available on a non-discriminatory basis.

AJC Publication Ordered for State Councils

Countering Extremism, which gives how-to-do-it help on organizing a community to counter increasing influence by radical-right organizations, is soon to be published by the American Jewish Committee. As promised at our last meeting of the state councils' staffs, we have ordered a number of copies sent to each state council. They will find these useful from time to time.

Don't Forget...

...the Community Leadership Development Workshop at the Sheraton-

Emory Inn in Atlanta, July 24-31. Send in your application, if you plan to go. Let me know that you are going to attend, so that we can plan our next state councils' staff meeting accordingly.

Late News Flashes!

Mr. William C. Allred, Jr., will become Executive Director of the North Carolina Council on Human Relations in July. Mr. Allred, a resident of Greensboro, is a graduate of Wake Forest College and next month will receive the M.A. degree from Emory University, Atlanta, in the field of history. His thesis: "The Southern Regional Council, 1943-1961."

For the past four years Mr. Allred has been employed in the actuarial and contract departments of Pilot Life Insurance Company in Greensboro. He is married and has two daughters, ages 6 and 2.

The Annual Meeting of the Southern Regional Council will be held on November 16, 17, and 18 this year. Please mark your calendar. Plans are incomplete, of course, but we hope this year to make presentation of state council affairs an integral part of the meeting, --instead of having it before the SRC meeting.

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER

State Council Staff Changes

The Arkansas Council on Human Relations has accepted the resignation of Ozell Sutton with regret, but with understanding. He has accepted a position with the Community Relations Service. Ozell will continue to live in Little Rock, but will travel in Arkansas and surrounding states. His resignation comes less than a month after he was named Executive Director upon Nat Griswold's pre-retirement leave-of-absence and after many years of service as Associate Director. As we understand it, Ozell could not love the Arkansas Council half so much, loved he not the prospect of college-educated children more. (Apologies to Will Shakespeare.) His resignation is effective July 31.

The Alabama Council Board of Directors has named Mr. Jerry Roden, of Auburn, Executive Director. At the same time they acted to retain as Associate Director Robert S. Valder, who has been doing a great job for the Alabama Council under the NAIRO Intern program for the past year. They also voted to move the state council office from Huntsville to Auburn. (New address: P.O. Box 1310, Auburn, Alabama.)

Jerry Roden was President of the East Alabama Chapter of the Alabama Council during 1965. Under his leadership that group grew from about 100 members to more than 300. (It has since increased to nearly 400.) It also developed vigorous programs, including cultural enrichment programs in several rural schools, work on voter education, an adult education class, a six-week lecture series, and sponsorship of four Head Start Centers.

Jerry, who is a Ph.D. candidate in the English Department at Auburn University, resigned as Editor of the Auburn alumni magazine in order to take up his doctoral studies last year. He had held that position for four years, and before that was a field representative for the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis. Thus he is very well qualified, and we welcome him into the state council tribe.

The Virginia Council has employed Mr. Bailey Wharton as Assistant to the Director. Mr. Wharton is a graduate of Hampton Institute in Virginia. He has a particular interest in urban problems. In his new position he will be especially concerned with local council organization and program, including efforts at membership enlistment and local fund-raising.

The White House Conference

Most of the state council Executive Directors attended the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights" on June 1 and 2. Bob Combs, Alice Spearman, August VandenBosche, Frances Pauley, Bob Valder Baxton Bryant, and Ozell Sutton were there -- as well as Paul Anthony, Vernon Jordan, Pat Watters, Emory Via and yours truly from SRC.

Poverty Conference in Mississippi

The Mississippi Council sponsored a conference on poverty in Jackson on June 4th. With a modest assist from SRC the MCHR brought in "grass roots" folks, gave them a chance to speak to federal and state anti-poverty officials, and provided opportunity for an exchange of views -- to put it mildly. The people who are on intimate terms with Poverty seemed to have no trouble communicating, despite the fact that they were not, as one put it, "highly-falooted speakers." To your reporter their story was put in a nutshell by a lady poet who remarked, "I can tell you it's been hard. Sometimes our hearts pack solid."

South Carolina Council Begins "Project SPEED-UP"

The South Carolina Council began "Project SPEED-UP" with a week of orientation for participating college students June 5 through 12. SPEED-UP means "Student Project for Economic and Educational Development -- Utilizing the Poor." With a grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity the SCCHR is employing 200 students from South Carolina Schools and Colleges for ten weeks, 40 hours per week, in educational and community organization projects all around the state. Besides the help to communities, the employment will enable the students to continue in college.

Alabama School Desegregation Conference Ends Series

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights has sponsored a series of state-wide conferences on school desegregation this spring. They were held in Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Florida, North Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, Arkansas, and Alabama. After each conference the American Friends Service Committee, the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, the Southern Regional Council, the council on human relations in the respective states, and other state groups cooperated in a nuts-and-bolts session designed to guide local leaders in organization to secure student transfers under freedom-of-choice desegregation plans. Attendance at these conferences averaged about 700, with the larger groups in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama.

At the Alabama Conference in Birmingham on June 11 some 1,200 people heard Commissioner Howe of the Office of Education reaffirm strongly that the new desegregation guidelines were legal and would be enforced. He did so in the face of daily machinations by Governor Wallace aimed at having the new guidelines voided and non-compliance by Alabama school boards. William Taylor of the Civil Rights Commission also spoke.

We should note gratefully the dedicated labor of the Civil Rights Commission field staff, under Mr. Samuel Simmons, and of Jean Fairfax, Constance Curry, and Winifred Falls of the AFSC staff in preparing these conferences on an almost-weekly basis. And they have commented often on the splendid cooperation from state councils on human relations. A pat on the back all around!

State Council Presidents Meet

On June 17 and 18 the Southern Regional Council brought together in Atlanta the presidents of the state councils for a day of discussion of purpose and philosophy of human relations councils, common problems, future emphases, staff needs and benefits, and the like. Presidents Walter Clancy of Arkansas, Duncan Gray of Mississippi, C. G. Gomillion of Alabama, Joe Hendricks of Georgia, H. Franklin Williams of Florida, and David Scull of Virginia attended. Treasurers G. J. Tarleton of Tennessee and Emery Rann of North Carolina represented their presidents, Martha Ragland and John R. Taylor, respectively. Mr. Frederick Fleming represented Mr. Henry Groppe of the Houston Council.

This was the first time that the presidents had had a conference without staff members present. They felt that it was helpful and asked that it become an annual affair. (It might also be helpful to have two or three hours of discussion on philosophy and direction at a meeting of each state council Board about once a year.)

Paperback Books Project

The first shipments of paperback books have gone out to projects in Auburn, Alabama, and Nashville, Tennessee. Within the next few days a shipment will be sent to the Selma (Alabama) Interreligious Project.

Proposals for these experimental projects in book distribution are beginning to come in, but so far we have had very few from local chapters of state councils on human relations. This is a disappointment, since such a project seems a "natural" for local councils. Perhaps some follow-through is needed by state council staffers -- checking with local groups to which you have recommended the project.

Notes on the SRC Special Projects

A Director for SRC's Special Project in Criminal Rehabilitation and Prison Reform has been found. Mr. John O. Boone will join the SRC staff in that capacity in July. Mr. Boone is a graduate of Morehouse College, Atlanta, and has a Master's degree in social work from Atlanta University. For fifteen years he has been employed by the Federal Bureau of Prisons. Currently he is Chief of the Classification and Parole Department of the federal prison at Terre Haute, Indiana. Before transferring to Terre Haute he had worked in the same department of the U. S. Penitentiary in Atlanta.

The Voter Education Project now employs Administrative Assistant Thad Olive and Research and Information Director Marvin Wall and two secretaries (Nobbie Morgan and Pat Franklin) in addition to Director Vernon Jordan. The VEP has funded 61 projects throughout the South. They range from a $200 project by the Lee County (Alabama) League of Women Voters, which taught some 2000 new voters how to use the voting machines, to "umbrella" projects covering several counties and sponsored by groups such as the NAACP in Alabama and the Arkansas Council on Human Relations. The break-down by state and number of projects is as follows: Alabama, 13; Arkansas, 3; Florida, 1; Georgia, 13; Louisiana, 4; Mississippi, 3; North Carolina, 4; South Carolina, 10; Tennessee, 4; and Virginia, 6.

Of particular interest to human relations council folks is the fact that voter registration projects are being sponsored by the Arkansas Council and the Knoxville Council. The Arkansas Council project will conduct a registration drive in 16 counties over a twelve-week period, employing a director and three field representatives. The Greater Knoxville Council's project will cover only Knox County. It will run for eight weeks and will employ a director and five area coordinators.

VEP funds have been concentrated on voter registration prior to this year's primary elections -- and general elections, where important, as in Arkansas this year. Later it will be possible to fund more citizenship education projects. Many local human relations councils should be able to sponsor or assist with these.

Al Ulmer, Director of the Community Organization Project, convened a planning conference on Cooperative Training at Mt. Beulah Conference Center, Edwards, Mississippi, on June 9, 10, and 11. Participants generally felt that while cooperatives are useful tools and more of them should be developed, a great deal of educational work needs to be done. They came up with some ambitious and far-reaching ideas about getting the necessary administrative and technical assistance. A summary of the conference is being sent to state council executive directors and is available to others on request.

Al (who says he prefers to stay at least a week in a place and dislikes one-day meetings) plans to spend a week in Lee County, South Carolina, in the near future, working on a possible buying club and credit union. Also in his future is a week in Amelia and Nottaway Counties, in Virginia, where the Virginia Students for Civil Rights Committee has done some preliminary work on credit unions and a study club on consumer education.

Moreland Smith of the Housing and Urban Planning Project thinks a revision of his report, "Neighborhood Stabilization: A Program," which is now in print will be of interest to the human relations councils. He would appreciate any comments and suggestions. He also would like to know about any efforts at neighborhood stabilization.

A Local Council That We Hope Is As Good As It Looks On Paper

We quote from a summary of the April 30 meeting of the Board of Directors of the North Carolina Council:

"Mr. Thomas Donnelly reported that the CHAPEL HILL-CARRBORO Council is involved in many activities, some of which are equal employment -- informing domestic workers of their rights under the Social Security program, fair working hours, summer vacations, etc.; education -- the youth group conducts a small scale "Operation Head Start" which includes games and reading for the children each Saturday; voter education -- informing new registrants on voting and government; housing -- bringing to the attention of the proper authorities infractions of the housing code, encouraging renters to keep records of their rent payments. Also, they are working to obtain sewers for some areas of the city, and they have organized a legal aid to handle civil hardship cases and to act as a clearing house for other groups."

Unquote.

More Staff Changes

It must be the season as well as our expansion on "all fronts". The staff changes, both in the state councils and SRC, are coming so fast that it is getting difficult to keep up!

The Arkansas Council has named Mr. Elijah Coleman to be their Associate Director. (Nat Griswold has been asked to return to his post as Executive Director until his replacement can be found.) Mr. Coleman has been principal of Townsend Park School in Pine Bluff since 1954. From 1959 through 1961 he was President of the Arkansas Teachers Association. He has also served as Chairman of the Pine Bluff Fellowship, an interorganization association of Negro professional workers for community progress. He is a native of Smackover, Arkansas, a graduate of Philander Smith College in Little Rock, and holds a Master of Education degree from the University of Arkansas. Mr. Coleman is married and has a 15-year-old son and a 10-year-old daughter.

Robert Alexander has resigned as Executive Director of the Houston Council on Human Relations. He has returned to Los Angeles. His successor has not yet been named.

Changes at Southern Regional Council

Sam Adams, Director of Research at SRC, has resigned to take up studies at the University of Wisconsin this fall. He is the recipient of a Russell Sage Foundation fellowship.

Edwyn E. Lewis will leave SRC August 19 in order to return to Miami's sun and sand and a management job with the community action agency of Miami's anti-poverty program.

On the additions side we have Miss Susan Bresler, who will work as an associate to Moreland Smith in our special project on housing and urban planning. Miss Bresler holds a B.S. in City Planning from the University of Illinois. She has worked as an intern in the planning departments of Champaign and Moline, Illinois, and with the Northeastern Illinois Planning Commission. Before coming to SRC she had been employed for a year in the Community Planning Division, Planning and Industrial Development Board, State of Alabama.

As for secretaries, we note the loss of Jerry Gimarc from the Housing and Urban Planning Project and Joan Browning from the Labor Project. Of particular interest to state council folks is the employment of Mrs. Mary Lee McCallister as secretary to the Director of Field Activities. Her experience includes thirteen years as a secretary with General Electric in Atlanta and four years with the American Red Cross in Chamblee.

Books For Equal Education

Books for Equal Education is a joint project of the United States National Student Association and the United State Youth Council. It is a non-profit, charitable organization engaged in distribution of college texts and fiction to unaccredited Negro colleges in the southeastern region. The book distribution office is located in Atlanta.

Many of the books received by BEE are not suitable for use at the college level, but are in good condition and perhaps could be utilized in other areas. These materials include: texts in mathematics, science, English and social studies at both the elementary and secondary levels; juvenile fiction; pre-school reading pamphlets and other similar materials. Suggested uses might be: adult literacy programs, Head Start projects, community libraries, and the like. Those interested in the books for such purposes should be forewarned that many of the texts are out-of-date. However, the books have been "culled," so that the ones offered are in good condition -- and many are definitely "quality" books.

There is NO CHARGE for the books, but the recipient is responsible for transportation of them from Atlanta to their final destination. Interested persons should write for a copy of the BEE guidelines. The address is: Shawn Boles, Southern Director Books for Equal Education, 416 Marietta Street, N. W., Atlanta, Georgia, 30303.

Leadership Training Laboratory at Emory

Most of the state council directors took SRC up on an offer to pay tuition for them to attend a week-long leadership training laboratory at Emory University in Atlanta. The dates were July 24-31, and those attending were Pat Miller of Louisiana, Ken Dean of Mississippi, Jerry Roden of Alabama, Alice Spearman of South Carolina, Will Allred of North Carolina, Bob Combs of Virginia, and Ed Stanfield. Baxton Bryant of Tennessee came, but had to leave after only one day because of a death in his family.

The laboratory was sponsored jointly by Emory University and Georgia State College in cooperation with National Training Laboratories. Focusing on the process of group action and the dynamics of interpersonal relations, the laboratory was designed to make participants more aware of the bearing of personal, human problems on group functioning. The week was harrowing (not to say "hairy") at times, as everybody sought to figure out why everybody else behaved so oddly. Folks leveled as well as reveled with one another. One comes away from such an experience with the feeling that he gained something important -- but that only time will tell just what!

Incidentally, the faculty included two mental health men, one psychologist, one social psychologist, and a consultant in human relations. Seems like the weight given to mental health and psychology says something about somebody's conception of the meaning of leadership in southern communities these days!

State Council Directors Meet

The state council directors met in Atlanta on August 9 and 10. Primary purpose of the meeting was to iron out some communication problems we have had in getting local councils informed of the program help now available from SRC. A six-page descriptive catalogue was prepared and discussed and is now being distributed to the state councils in sufficient quantity to promote the programs extensively in each state. In the process the group had opportunity to clarify many points in conference with the special project directors. Next meeting of the directors is scheduled for September 21 and 22.

Random Notes

...On the morning of August 10 a delegation from the Georgia Council on Human Relations had an interview with Governor Carl Sanders. Among other things they urged him to employ a special assistant concerned with civil rights and to establish a civil rights division of the state attorney general's office. They pointed out discriminatory practices of the State Patrol and the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. They also reminded the governor and, through press coverage, the public that no Negroes sit on the following state boards: Education, Regents, Corrections, Pardons and Paroles, Game and Fish Commission, Veterans Service, Personnel, Industry and Trade, State Medical Examination, and State Scholarship Commission. There may not be immediate results, but this strikes me as a good piece of work nevertheless. We get so accustomed to the southern landscape that even people of good will do not notice so glaring an injustice as the omission of Negroes from practically every state board and agency. Surely one of the most important tasks of every human relations council is to keep nagging officials and the public about this kind of matter-of-fact outrage.

...Speaking of never-ending tasks, I had occasion not long ago to ask Mrs. H. A. Pfiffner, President of the League of Women Voters of Georgia, how they managed to get objective studies and reports with volunteer workers. Her reply read, in part: "Most local and state Leagues have regular observers at official boards and commissions--at every open meeting--at budget hearings, etc. It is surprising how much one can learn from regular attendance and careful listening to aid in factual evaluation." It occurred to me that if every local council did nothing else but assign a couple of people to monitor every meeting of (1) their city council, (2) their board of education, (3) their county commission, and (4) their police or recorder's court, their existence would be justified. Why not make this "standard operational procedure"?

...Project SPEED-UP roars on in South Carolina under the leadership of Brad Posten, who is the project director. Brad has completed his year as an Eleanor Roosevelt Intern with the South Carolina Council. He writes, "The project has met with great response from the communities and over 2,000 children and adults are enrolled in the twenty-eight centers."

...We keep finding out about really great things that are being done quietly by human relations councils. Johnny Carlisle of the Youth Council on Human Relations, affiliated with the Palm Beach chapter of the Florida Council, wrote the other day, seeking just $150.00 to buy materials for their second "Summer Tutorial and Enrichment Program." Twenty-two young people, including advanced high school students, high school graduates, and junior college students, are tutoring 91 children, aged 4 to 13, who live in the vicinity of Pleasant Heights Baptist Church, which is their center. They have tutoring classes in reading, math, geography, history, science, arts and crafts, and music. And field trips include the zoo, the Junior Museum of Science, Norton Art Gallery, "and other points of interest." All these young folks needed was a little financial assistance and the continuing interest and advice of the council board. Mrs. R. W. Glasner, chapter president, and Mrs. W. Fred Ellington, work closely with them.

...The Virginia Council is putting major emphasis this year on intercultural (multi-ethnic) textbooks for use in public schools. The Council took cognizance of the fact that Virginia's children, Negro or white, could easily graduate from high school, using the texts approved by the Virginia Board of Education, without knowing that Negroes had made any significant contribution to the life and history of America. Further, they discovered that many textbooks are published in two versions: one with biracial illustrations and another lily white. VCHR has just published an attractive printing of its review of Virginia textbooks, including suggested courses of action, and a catalogue of intercultural texts available.

MEMORANDUM

September 8, 1966

TO: State Council Directors

FROM: Ed Stanfield

SUBJECT: Next Meeting of State Council Directors

As you know, our next meeting is to be September 21-22, starting at 2:00 on Wednesday and ending about noon on Thursday. We shall meet in the S. R. C. conference room.

The Southern Interagency Conference will be meeting from 2:00 on the 20th until noon on the 21st, and you are invited to attend that meeting also. It might be of considerable interest to you. Dr. Lewis Killian of the University of Florida will speak on the first afternoon on the role of white liberals in social change in the South. Other features of that meeting will be briefings on the political situation by Vernon Jordan and on school and hospital desegregation by representatives of the regional office of H. E. W. (The latter presentation will be on Wednesday morning, so you might catch that even if you can't come on Tuesday.)

For our own meeting, following the suggestion of some of you, I have invited two men from government agencies here to talk to us about program concerns and the role of their offices. They are Bob Thompson, Special Assistant for Intergroup Relations to the Regional Director of the Department of Housing and Urban Development; and Don Hollowell, Regional Director of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In addition, we may have the H. E. W. representatives stay over from the S. I. C. meeting - in case some of you can't get here early.

As for expenses, let us try the following formula: S. R. C. will pay one-half of your expenses for travel, room and meals, plus all travel cost in excess of $50.00. In this way the distance some have to travel will not be an excessive burden. We can make any adjustments in this formula after trying it once.

I am going to leave it to you to get your own accommodations, so that you can order exactly the room you want. Since most seemed satisfied with the Americana Motor Hotel, let me suggest that one. Perhaps I'll arrange a dinner for us there on the evening of the 21st.

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER

September 28, 1966

Personnel

The death of Mr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Associate Director of the Georgia Council on Human Relations, grieved all of us. Mr. Holmes died on September 19. Frances Pauley of the Georgia Council and Vernon Jordan of SRC were among those who spoke briefly at his funeral on September 22.

Frances Dukler has been named Acting Director of the Houston Council on Human Relations. Frances, a long-time member of the Houston Council's Board of Directors, has agreed to "fill in" until an Executive Director can be found to succeed Robert Alexander. The state council directors had a chance to meet Frances at their September 21-22 get-together in Atlanta -- and went away hoping she would apply for the job, like permanent.

Paul Wahrhaftig has joined the staff of the Georgia Council. Mr. Wahrhaftig is an attorney, which will probably turn the other state councils green with envy. Paul was born in Oakland California. He was graduated with honors from Stanford University in 1960 with a degree in political science. His legal training was at Boalt Hall, University of California Law School. For two years he practiced in Oakland with the firm of McKee, Tasheiva and Wahrhaftig. He spent last summer with the American Friends Service Committee, tutoring for school desegregation in South Carolina.

SRC Staff Additions

Mrs. Hattie Johnson, who hails from Montgomery, Alabama, has joined the SRC staff where she will work part time as assistant to the Treasurer and part time as secretary in the Labor Project.

William Farmar has come to SRC since the last newsletter to assist John Boone in our Prison Administration and Criminal Rehabilitation Project. Mr. Farmar is from Chicago. He attended the University of Chicago and worked for the Cook County Welfare Department.

Most of the state council staffs have by this time met Louise Cole, who has been administering our Paperback Book Project among other things. Louise has become a permanent member of the SRC staff as a research associate. Born in Pensacola, Florida, she received her B. A. from Newcomb College of Tulane University. In her junior year she studied at the University of Sheffield, England. Despite her natural modesty Miss Cole admits, when pressed, to being a Phi Beta Kappa and a Woodrow Wilson Fellow. After Tulane she took a Master's in political science at the University of California at Berkeley. She comes to SRC after a short stint with Buttenheim Publishing Corporation in New York City.

John A. Pecoul, Jr., came to SRC on a temporary basis September 5. He is working on some research projects and in the field department. John, who is from New Orleans, was valedictorian of his class at Alcee Fortier High School there. He received a B. A. in philosophy from Elmhurst College in 1961, ranking first in his class. In 1964 he was graduated magna cum laude from Union Theological Seminary, second in his class. He has just received his M. A. in political science from Temple University. His wife's name is Ellen.

Project on Penal Reform and Criminal Rehabilitation Making Progress

Staffing of the Penal Reform Project is complete with the employment of Mr. William Farmar, as noted above. With an assist from state council directors research on existing conditions is in progress under the coordination of Dr. Vernon Fox of Florida State University. Before November 1 Dr. Fox and SRC staff members will correlate and evaluate the material and publish a Southern Regional Council Special Report.

Other plans include research on comparative sentencing policies in felony cases with particular emphasis on disparity in length of sentence attributable to race or socio-economic level; technical assistance to state prison systems, especially on racial integration; penal reform programs in Arkansas (one of the worst states in this respect) and Mississippi; wide distribution of information about corrections in fact-sheet or brochure form; and recruitment of Negroes for professional training in the field of corrections.

Women's Meetings on Unequal Justice

With the cooperation of the human relations councils and practically all women's organizations, Mrs. M. E. Tilly, SRC's director of women's work, is conducting a series of meetings in the southern states to arouse and coordinate interest in court proceedings, sentencing practices, etc., in southern courts. The purpose is to prepare women's groups and others to visit courts, observe, report findings, and -- hopefully -- effect less discriminatory administration of justice.

Meetings have already been held in Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina. Mrs. Tilly's schedule for the rest of the fall reads as follows: Virginia, October 19; North Carolina, October 20; Kentucky, October 26; Tennessee, October 27; Alabama, November 2; Louisiana, November 9; Mississippi, November 10; and Arkansas, November 15.

Helpful Meetings in Atlanta

The state council directors are meeting more frequently this year in an effort at better coordination of program and exchange of ideas, as well as professional edification. They were in Atlanta for three days, September 20-22, for a meeting of the Southern Interagency Conference and an overnight meeting of their own.

Highlight of the SIC meeting was a presentation by Dr. Lewis Killian of Florida State University on "The Role of White Liberals in Social Change in the South." There was a reactor panel, and interest was high. Of particular interest was the rather general feeling that white liberals (and moderates), including the Washington establishment, are backing away from civil rights.

At their own meeting the directors had sessions with Samuel Younge, Assistant to the Regional Director for Civil Rights, Department of Health, Education and Welfare; Bob Thompson, Regional Office of the Department of Housing and Urban Development; and Don Hollowell of the Atlanta Office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Georgia Council Programs

Another helpful feature of our Atlanta meeting was a how-we-did it report by Frances Pauley of the Georgia Council on their welfare research project and their "Know Your Rights" program in cooperation with A.C.L.U. of Georgia.

With the help of the Columbia University School of Social Work and the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, the Georgia Council conducted research on the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program in four Georgia counties. A good questionnaire was prepared with expert aid; then 180 families were interviewed. Basically the council wanted to answer the question "Are children in need receiving their rights under the law?" And the answer they come up with is "No." They discovered case after case of arbitrary withholding of aid to which applicants were legally entitled. Although their full report has not yet been published, the GCHR has already secured a lengthy and, on the whole, sympathetic hearing from the Georgia Department of Family and Children Services.

Another Georgia project of particular interest is really a joint effort by the GCHR, SRC, and the Georgia ACLU. It is publication of a booklet titled "Know Your Rights," which tells in simple language and with liberal use of illustrations (by Marge Manderson of SRC) what rights an individual has when arrested by a law officer.

"Conference on People, Religion and a Changing Virginia"

Fully 1,500 people, three-fourths of them laymen, are expected to attend a Conference on People, Religion and a Changing Virginia at the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond on November 28 and 29. It is planned under the auspices of the Virginia Council on Human Relations in cooperation with leaders of the statewide religious community.

Among the subjects to be dealt with are "The Theological Bases for the Social Concern of the Religious Community," "The Role of the Religious Community in the Concern for Fair Housing," "The Role of the Religious Community in Changing Educational Patterns, "The Responsibility of the Religious Community to Set Its Own House in Order," and "Where Do We Go From Here?" Leaders include George D. Kelsey, John F. Cronin, Jacob M. Rothschild, Warren H. Turner, and Carlyle Marney. There will be a special student section with 200 students and 60 seminarians in attendance. Their featured speaker will be Samuel D. Proctor, special assistant to the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

RANDOM NOTES

... A memorandum from the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights notes that the Senate votes on the minimum wage bill and the 1966 civil rights bill cloture resolution both came within one hour. Minimum wage increase and extension was won; civil rights lost. But the proximity brought out sharply "that the same Senators who support civil rights tend also to support programs for economic and social advancement." Or you might say that people who have no regard for Negroes have, when you get right down to it, no regard for anybody--except themselves, of course.

... The annual meeting of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations will be held in Jackson on October 27. Roger Wilkins, Director of the Community Relations Service, U. S. Department of Justice, will be the featured speaker.

... The Florida Council's annual meeting will be in Daytona Beach on October 14 and 15.

... The Louisiana Council office has been opened at 7986 Scenic Highway in Baton Rouge. And beautiful it is, too, thanks to the impeccable taste of executive director Pat Miller. I think the attractiveness of the office will say something important to every visitor. Congratulations to Pat and the LCHR.

... I like a paper that Augie VandenBosche of the Florida Council drew up to help answer a question he kept getting, "What can a local council on human relations do?" Augie catalogues and describes a number of roles for the local council: communicator, fact finder, educator, programmer, consultant, cooperator, observer, attitude refiner. We've lost something in translation, here, but it is a neat and useful summary.

... Under the able administration of Louise Cole the paperback books project is looking up. Louise prepared lists of books in several categories -- such as "leisure reading for youth and adults," "leisure reading for children," "Negro history and culture," "reference books," etc. -- and has been distributing them. That seems to be what turned the trick, for requests are coming in with increasing frequency now. Thanks, too, to the state council staffs for helping to get the word out.

COORDINATING COUNCIL OF COMMUNITY ORGANIZATIONS

366 East 47th Street Chicago, Illinois

OPEN HOUSING DEMONSTRATORS GREETED BY MOBS

The implementation of the Open Housing Provisions of the Open City declared on July 12, 1966 has met with violent resistance despite Governor Kerner's Executive Order and the Chicago Fair Housing Ordinance. Resistance has been encountered in the first communities visited--Gage Park-Chicago Lawn, Belmont-Cragin, Bogan, and Cicero; these particular communities were selected because of their proximity to the present Negro community and the availability of good, reasonable housing.

Between July 14 and July 28 the availability of housing to Negroes was tested in the Gage Park-Chicago Lawn and Belmont-Cragin area. No housing was available to Negroes, although there were empty apartments and houses. (Continued page 3)

WHERE ARE YOU?

The mobs which have attacked peaceful demonstrators are encouraged by your absence and silence. Demonstrate your own convictions by volunteering to help cure the hate and injustice which plague Chicago. If you can drive, walk, talk, cook, or contribute money, then you can help effect the treatment.

Don't be in the mob even in spirit! Volunteer today at your action center: South side - Warren Avenue Church, 3101 W. Warren, 638-2725; West side - Greater Mount Hope Baptist Church, 309 W. 60th Street, 723-1015.

"DON'T BUY" PEPSI CAMPAIGN BEGINS

All attempts at negotiation have failed. Operation Breadbasket began a city-wide economic withdrawal campaign against the Pepsi-Cola Bottling Company Friday, August 12.

After having earned major job gains in the major milk industries, Operation Breadbasket's new campaign represents the first of a series of efforts to negotiate with major soft drink industries in Chicago.

Because these major firms find a large income source in the ghetto, but are unwilling to return benefits--such as income for the Negro--to it, (Cont'd p. 5)

WHY WE MARCH
an editorial

We march in order to mobilize the conscience of a nation. We march to make literal and explicit the forces of hate that work (unnoticed by many) on a subtle, but nonetheless injurious level of discrimination. And we march in order to forge for ourselves a powerful tool of non-violence before which blind segregation must always fall. Freedom Marchers have, by their very marches, asked the question "which side are you on?" of Negro and white alike.

Led by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and Al Raby, the Marchers have proved, by the reactions to their presence, that simple segregationism explains why Chicago is a closed city. That Chicago housing policies intentionally discriminate has been demonstrated by the violence that has been directed toward the Marchers.

But bricks, bottles and epithets are boomerangs. They injure indiscriminately those who discriminate.

And those who hurl them in the name of "community pride" obviously lose that pride and wound the foundation upon which a healthy community, and city, must rest. "Defending one's rights" by wresting from another human being rights that the law guarantees are his, is to violate the rights of all men!

SPEAK UP! SPEAK OUT!

Like other forms of mass media, radio and TV have fads. And now television talk programs are springing up on the stations.

Often program discussions center around some aspect of the problems of urban living, such as housing, unemployment, or credit abuses. Unfortunately, the Chicago Freedom Movement's point of view is too often absent. There simply aren't enough Chicagoans calling to express opinions based on humanitarian grounds!

This is a job each of us could do. The only equipment needed is a radio or television set, a telephone - and lots of patience as you wait for a telephone line.

Keep an eye and ear out for announcements of subjects of particular concern to you. Some of the talk-programs that get many calls are: the Larry Atteberry Show and the Jerry Williams Show.

Surely one way we can influence public opinion is by expressing our own on shows aired far beyond our own communities. Let's speak up and speak out!

REPORT YOUR LOSS OR INJURY!

If you received any personal injury or if your car was damaged, in a Chicago Freedom Movement demonstration, be sure to file a report with the CCCO Legal Committee, which expects to file damage suits for those cases requiring such action. Even if your insurance covers the damage or injury, please make a report. Contact Robert Hostetter at the CCCO office, 548-6540.

Some of the realtors tested simply refused to serve the Negroes by closing their offices, while others just claimed that they had no availble listings. Regardless of their method, all of the realtors tested violated the law. It was decided at this point that the strategy needed to be expanded from shop-ins, vigils, church visits, and picnics to non-violent demonstrations.

The plan of the co-chairmen, Dr. King and Al Raby, was to further dramatize the injustice that the Negro faces in Chicago and to bring creative pressures to bear to help develop a just society. The reaction was overwhelmingly violent. Bottles, rocks, cherry bombs were thrown; cars were burned and vandalized. To date fifty persons have been injured and thirty cars destroyed. Dr. King described it as "the worst hate I have ever seen."

The police have been unable at times to control the mobs and are now calling for peace. But as Al Raby said, "Peace cannot reign until the law is being enforced and upheld."

The threats and acts of violence continue and they are not perpetuated by a few "nuts" but are the general mood of these communities. The leadership has determined to continue until this hate and injustice is cured and the only way to do this is to expose it to the light of day. All of the action projects are dedicated to this and to forcing Negroes, Liberals, Bigots, and Moderates to recognize this, to understand it, and to cure this disease.

CCCO VOLUNTEERS ON THE MOVE

The CCCO Volunteer Group is a growing activist group open to all CCCO workers. The group, organized after the Freedom Festival, now has 75 active members participating in the Action Program of the Open City as well as in their own projects.

At their last meeting the volunteers heard a report from the Rev. Dave Wallace on the Action Program and voted to contribute $55 to provide a bus for the transportation of Taylor residents to the Freedom Rally. They also decided that their picnic would be held in a segregated park as a part of their group participation in the Open City campaign.

The volunteer group is chaired by Mattie Clark and King Frisby. Its main goal is to perform the double function of giving volunteers more information on Movement activities and making their services more effective.

The group meets every second Friday of the month at 7:30 P.M. at the VFW Hall at 366 E. 47th St. A major portion of each meeting is devoted to an educational program. If you wish to become an active participant in the Movement, reserve Friday, September 9th for the next Volunteer meeting.

HOSPITALS DISCRIMINATING?

The Coordinating Council has been asked to help substantiate charges of Chicago hospitals discriminating among patients, employees, or physicians because of race, color or national origin.

(Cont'd p.5)

TAC CALLS RENT STRIKE

The Tenants' Action Council of Old Town Garden Apartments, on the Near North Side, called a rent strike beginning August 1. Daily picketing is going on through August.

Old Town Gardens had remained an all-white building while the surrounding area had become over-crowded and largely Negro. The manager began to integrate the building, and at the same time cut services allowing the building to deteriorate. Rents were raised, accompanied by promises for services that were never delivered.

The tenants are demanding that the New York owners and the part-time manager Sam Lane reverse the trend toward slumism in the building and recognize the Tenants' Action Council as a tenants' union with collective bargaining rights.

Negotiations between the owners, management, and tenants to date have proved fruitless. Minor concessions and promises were made without responsible continuity on the part of the owners and management.

A 15-day rent delay in May and a 20-day rent delay in June also proved fruitless. In July plans were laid for an indefinite strike, beginning August 1, with the goal of obtaining full recognition for TAC as a tenant's union.

Support to TAC and their efforts has come from CCCO, SCLC, the IUD-AF of L-CIO, UAW, as well as neighborhood groups. You can show your support by joining the picket at the Manager's Office any day during August.

KOCO FIGHTS FOR OPEN HOUSING

A major battle is being waged by the Kenwood-Oakland Community Organization against the construction of low and high rise public housing at four sites within the Kenwood-Oakland boundaries. KOCO is demanding that no more public housing construction take place until the community is totally informed about a comprehensive plan for the whole area and has a voice in what that plan will be.

KOCO has sponsored several meetings between community leaders and Mr. Swibel, the Administrator of CHA. Having gained no results from him nor from Alderman Holman in their attempt to prevent more segregated housing, KOCO is developing a new strategy.

Within a short time two KOCO representatives will bring 2000 petition signatures to Robert C. Weaver, Secretary of the department of Housing and Urban Development, demanding that he reverse federal approval of these plans. KOCO representatives will be visiting all the heads of city departments related to housing matters. KOCO will also dramatize the segregated public housing issue in its area and the entire city. Through direct action KOCO is attempting to help fulfill the Open Housing Declaration of the Chicago Freedom Movement. * * * * * * * *

ARE YOU WELL INFORMED?

To know the plans for the Chicago Freedom Movement's continuing steps, you must attend the mass meetings:

West Side: Mondays - 8 P.M., at Warren Ave. Church, 3101 W.Warren

South Side: Thursdays - 8 P.M.--Greater Mt. Hope Baptist Church--60th Place & Princeton

"OPERATION WATCHDOG" BEGINS

The $195 million bond issues approved June 14 is a lot of anybody's money! In this case, it's your money, to be repaid, with interest, out of Chicago taxes.

Will your neighborhood get the street lights it needs? The sewers? The new "L" stations? Are the bulldozers aimed at your community? Where will the new public housing be located?

To learn these plans in advance, in time for the Freedom Movement to act effectively, the meetings and reports of over 25 City agencies, departments and City Council committees must be watched.

These public bodies meet during daytime hours, once or twice a month, usually for three or four hours, occasionally all day. Volunteers must be able to take reasonably complete and accurate notes. Housewives, college students and retired persons having some experience in note-taking would make good volunteers.

To volunteer--or suggest a volunteer from your organization--leave a message with the name and telephone chairman, at the CCCO office, 548-6540.

Operation Breadbasket has undertaken, with considerable past successes, the breakdown of this pattern of discrimination. Recently, Operation Breadbasket boycotted the Dean-Bowman Milk Company and got 45 jobs averaging $7500 per year.

During the last four months, the Operation has succeeded in getting 224 jobs for Negroes; this represents a total community income of almost $1.8 million.

As examples of the unfair hiring practices within the Pepsi-Cola company, of the 72 clerical and office employees, none are Negro. Of 183 driver salesmen employed, only 24 are Negroes. Job upgrading within the company is minimal. Operation Breadbasket is asking for a specific number of jobs as well as integration in all job categories.

Dr. Jasper F. Williams, chairman of the Council of Hospitals and Medical Association, has informed us of his belief that Chicago hospitals are not complying with the non-discriminatory edicts of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Title VI of the Civil Rights Act prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color or national origin in federally-assisted programs. To be eligible to receive federal assistance or participate in any federally-assisted program a hospital must be in compliance with Title VI. Data on discrimination is needed; call or send complaints to CCCO.

GREEN STREET ASSOCIATION FILES SUIT

The Green Street Association filed an appellants' brief August 4th in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. This is one phase in their civil rights suit against the Central Englewood Urban Renewal Plan.

At issue is: 1. The urban renewal clearance of 600 housing units to enlarge seven public parking lots and create a shopping mall at the retail intersection of West 63rd and South Halsted Streets. 2.Eighty per cent of the housing that was found to be in standard condition by the U.S. Census of Housing. 3. A Chicago Bureau of Parking survey showing the parking lots are only half to two-thirds used, with one lot closed because of no patronage. 4. That the destruction of sound Negro-owned and occupied housing to benefit private business constitutes a conspiracy to deprive Negro citizens of their rights.

The suit also charges that the practice of relocating displaced families according to race, under programs receiving federal assistance, violates the Federal Housing Act of 1949 and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution as well as the Civil Rights Act.

The plaintiffs had asked the District court to "enjoin and restrain" the defendant city and federal agencies from proceeding with the project, including acquisition of properties.

COMMUNITY UNION CENTER OPENS

The Industrial Union Department of the AFL-CIO, in cooperation with CCCO-SCLC, has opened a Community Union Center at 4002 W. Roosevelt Rd. to organize the working poor. For information call 638-3457.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SILENT

One year ago, in July, 1965, CCCO submitted an official complaint to the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare. It was charged--and illustrated in great detail--that the Chicago Board of Education was violating the Civil Rights Act.

Six months ago, in December, 1965, CCCO filed another complaint charging that the school system was wasting millions of dollars in federal aid. Again numerous examples were cited to document the charges.

Thus far, the federal government has failed to take any real action. It has investigated and investigated, but has not changed a single practice of racial discrimination in the Chicago public schools.

Following is a letter CCCO recently received from U.S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe II, in response to our visit with him in Washington June 1st and our letter of July 20th:

"Dear Mr. Raby:

When you were good enough to stop in at the Office of Education early in June, I told you that I would let you know by August 1 whether I could see any light ahead in our investigation of the complaint you have filed with us concerning discrimination in the Chicago Schools. Specifically, I agreed to let you know by that date whether we could promise reasonable answers to the points in your memorandum citing a variety of situations attested by you as constituting discrimination.

"After the middle of June we pursued further extensive conversations with officials in the Chicago

EXCESSIVE BOND LOWERED

An excessive bond of $7,500--one of many levied against persons arrested on the west side--was reduced recently to permit a defendant to go free on his signature, thanks to the labors of the newly-organized Chicago Human Rights Legal Committee. Attorneys working with SCLC and CCCO met last spring to unite their efforts, a move which has proved very effective.

Legal Committee attorneys Gil Cornfield and Gil Feldman have been involved in negotiating the collective bargaining contract between the West-side Union to End Slums and the Coster and Costellis real estate company. Leo Holt, from the Legal Committee, Mike Meltsner, from the New York based NAACP Legal Aid Fund Inc., and other attorneys have succeeded in getting lowered the excessive bail levied against persons arrested on the West Side several weeks ago.

The Legal Committee also provides legal services for persons arrested in demonstrations and protests growing out of the Summer Action Program. An example of this may be seen in the Committee's plans to file suit for injuries and damages sustained during the recent Gage Park demonstrations.

To carry out this array of activities the Legal Committee needs the services of volunteer lawyers, as well as financial support. Contributions should be sent to: The Chicago Human Rights Legal Committee, 166 W. Washington St., Suite 718, Chicago, Ill. For information about the Committee, call AN 3-6054.

schools. They have been helpful, and I have been assured that we will be able to get adequate information to give you what is in our view a reasonable answer to the points you have made. We will not have this fully prepared by August 1, but it will be in the process of preparation. "We expect, of course, to be in touch with the Chicago School Board and the General Superintendent first of all. We wish to avoid further public charges and counter--charges, and if there turns out to be what we regard as discrimination we plan to work with the Board of Education to have that body make changes which we think are necessary. If changes are required and are not acted upon by the Board, we would, of course, have to move to formal legal hearing. After we have been in touch with the Chicago Board, we shall give you a formal answer to the points you have made.

"I did want to get in touch with you prior to August 1 about these matters. The memorandum which we will be sending to the Board of Education is now in preparation as the result of visits in Chicago during the last month. Your letter of July 20 has just arrived, but the study referred to has not yet come in. As soon as it arrives, we will include it in our review of the Title I problem.

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER

New SRC Publications

Our mail room is a study in creative disarray these days as the Southern Regional Council is issuing a rash of new publications.

Our Voter Education Project has recently put out a county-by-county list of registration figures covering the whole South, with figures for the white voting age population, Negro voting-age population, number of each group registered, and percentages registered. They have also published an eight-page mimeographed analysis of the November election results, focusing on participation of Negroes and its effect, titled "What Happened in the South, 1966." (The VEP has been responsible for programs through which 100,000 voters have been registered during the past year.)

"School Desegregation 1966: The Slow Undoing" is just off the press. A "Special Report," it tells the dismal story of the South's all-too-successful efforts to avoid significant integration of its school systems. It estimates that ten to twelve percent of Negro students in the South are in schools with whites, with figures like 2% for Mississippi, 2.9% for Louisiana, and 2.4% for Alabama offset by 34.6% in Texas and 21.9% in Tennessee.

"Public Assistance in the South," another Special Report, points out that 21.8% of all expenditures for public assistance payments occurred in the South, reflecting the South's 25.9% of the population. But nearly half of the poor people of the nation are in the South. Another fact brought out is far more is spent in the South on aid to the aged than on aid to dependent children -- despite the fact that there are many more impoverished children than impoverished elderly people. This reflects the political utility of aid to the voting elderly. This report is loaded with information. For instance, although I suppose I knew it all along, it came as a bit of a shock to me to see from one of the tables provided that, among 50 states and the District of Columbia, Georgia, North Carolina, Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, South Carolina, Arkansas, and Mississippi rank 42nd, 43rd, 45th, 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 50th, and 51st, respectively, in per capita income! That's what I like about the South -- we're consistent.

And then there is the excellent publication of our Special Project in Housing and Urban Planning, "A Home of Our Own: A Guide for Home Buyers." (In the light of those per capita income figures, that title almost sounds like a cruelty joke!) It has a chapter on the advantages and disadvantages of buying a home, one on what to look for in shopping for a home, another on "Closing the Deal," and a chapter on breaking racial barriers. There is a glossary of terms and a list of helpful pamphlets and articles.

"State Councils' Dinner" at the SRC Annual Meeting

For the benefit of readers who were not there, I want to tell briefly about the "State Councils' Dinner" which was a feature of the Southern Regional Council's Annual Meeting in November. All of the executive directors and the president or vice-president of each state council were present and seated at the head tables. The program was quite simple, consisting of presentation of the George Mitchell Award (for largest percentage increase in membership) to the Arkansas Council by Mr. Marion Wright and the field activities report. A few statistics from the latter:

"...Membership now stands at approximately 11,500, and increase of some 23% over last year. Percentage increases ranged from five percent in Virginia, which is the largest of the councils, to ninety-five percent in Arkansas, which heretofore had been one of the smallest. The Alabama Council, which won the Mitchell Award last year, increased its membership another ten percent this year. Tennessee registers a thirteen percent increase and South Carolina a jump of twenty-three percent. The North Carolina Council shows a 57% increase. And Georgia deserves special commendation for raising its membership enrollment by 53%, although starting from a relatively large base of more than a thousand members."

"At the height of their strength the state councils had this year 26 full-time professional employees, an increase of 18% over last year. Part-time and clerical staffs have increased proportionately."

"The councils have raised about $120,000 from their members and friends -- an increase of 20%. At the same time the total of their operating budgets has passed $400,00 -- a leap of more than 25%."

The Paperback Books Project

It took a little while for the word to get out, apparently, but during the past couple of months we have had a tremendous increase in the number of inquiries about our Paperback Books Project and requests for books. In fact, the demand has been so great that it is necessary to delay further orders until the backlog is diminished and we can assess the situation. It is our hope that the proposals we are receiving, even if we are not able to answer them affirmatively at this time, will help us to secure funds for a renewed and enlarged program in 1967.

Notes on the State Councils

I have let so much time elapse since my last newsletter, and the state councils have been doing so much meanwhile, that I cannot begin to do them all justice. I'll have to mention only a few items of particular interest.

The Arkansas Council has secured a Research Assistant, Mr. Paul Williams, who joined their staff on September 26. Mr. Williams was born and raised in Fort Smith. He recently was graduated from Hendrix College in Conway, where he majored in history and political science. He did the research for the Arkansas Council's "Background Report on Arkansas Prisons" and is working with a penal reform group which the Council helped to set up. He is also working with students and local councils.

I don't ordinarily like to receive unsigned letters, but a recent one was a pleasure. Signed only "A(rkansas)CHR," it said only, "It appears that Human Relations are improving in Arkansas. What about Georgia?" Enclosed was a newspaper clipping about the appointment of Negro lawyer Christopher C. Mercer, Jr., as deputy prosecuting attorney for Pulaski and Perry Counties. Prosecuting Attorney-elect Richard B. Adkisson, in making the announcement, said that Mercer would be the first Negro deputy prosecuting attorney in history for the two counties and that he probably would be the first Negro deputy prosecutor in the South in modern times. Among other distinctions, Mr. Mercer worked for two years on the staff of the Arkansas Council on Human Relations.

The Tennessee Council continues to have the luck of the Irish (viz. Baxton Bryant) in their staffing. Not long ago the Inter-County Improvement Association, an organization of approximately 200 Negroes with headquarters in Ripley, made an unusual proposal to the TCHR. They asked to become a chapter and offered to put up $3,000 (cash!) if the Council would find another $6,000 and hire a man to work full-time in rural west Tennessee. The Council appealed successfully to the Field Foundation and has hired The Reverend Isaac Richmond, Jr., for the job. Mr. Richmond, 28, is a graduate of Lane College, Jackson, Tennessee, with an A.B. in history and sociology. He also has a Master of Religious Education degree from ITC in Atlanta. He has long been active in civil rights efforts.

The Virginia Council instigated and did most of the administrative work for the Conference on People, Religion and a Changing Virginia which was held at the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond on November 28-29. 1,075 people registered for the conference, which was sponsored by all of the major religious groups of the state. Speakers included Dr. George D. Kelsey, professor of Christian Ethics, Drew University; Dr. John F. Cronin, assistant director, Department of Social Action, National Catholic Welfare Conference; Rabbi Jacob M. Rothschild, Hebrew Benevolent Congregation, Atlanta; Warren H. Turner, vice-president, Protestant Episcopal Executive Council, New York; and Dr. Samuel Proctor, president of the Institute for Services to Education, Washington.

Annual Meetings of the Florida, South Carolina, and Georgia Council

All three of the above councils have had excellent annual meetings recently. I won't try to go into detail about each of the programs, but will risk a generalization based on my subjective impressions from attending the South Carolina and Florida meetings and a reading of the minutes of the Georgia one (which, regrettably, I missed). At all three there were reports from local councils that indicate an increasing amount of involvement and important work on the part of their members. How do you measure interest and enthusiasm, except subjectively? But I came away from the meetings greatly encouraged, with the feeling that there are great many people -- white people and Negroes, poor people and economically comfortable people -- who are willing (yearning, even to work together on the problems of community where they live. If that is so, it bodes well for the state councils on human relations, for, as far as I am concerned, that's what they are all about.

And a Bit of Humor

I guess I got a kick out of this story because of the way Yankee liberals have been hanging back on civil rights lately. (This is a slightly adapted version.)

December 27, 1966

It seems that a white southerner moved to Chicago and was determined to get along with the natives. He walked into a local bar, struck up a conversation with the guy on the next stool, and in due course observed, "If you ask me, all Ku Klux Klansmen are S.O.B.'s." His new acquaintance got up, slugged him, and stomped out.

The southerner rubbed his chin and turned to the guy on the other side. "Man, what a character. But I still say all members of the KKK are S.O.B.'s." Whereupon he also flattens him and walks out.

He picked himself up, ordered another drink, and observed to the bartender, "I wouldn't have thought this was Ku Klux Klan territory."

And the bartender replied, "Who said it was? This is S.O.B. country!"

THE SHAPING OF THE TELEVISION MEDIUM

A talk given at the Speech Association of America's annual convention, in New York City,
December 30, 1965

By Roy Danish

Director, Television Information Office
666 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10019

May I first express my delight – and I'm sure it is shared by my industry – that you have invited a representative of commercial broadcasting to speak to you today.

It is nearly two decades since commercial television flickered into life in a few thousand homes and taverns. The cabinets have grown smaller and the screens have grown larger, and they have moved from the wings to stage front and center in most people's living rooms and minds. But during the time when millions of families were buying their sets, teachers, for the most part, tended to remain at intellectual arm's length from this newest of the social forces.

There are, of course, ample precedents for this reluctance to accept a new, and perhaps competitive, phenomenon. Socrates frowned on writing just as, a millennium and a half later, scribes and clergy frowned when the first mass medium was born of movable type.

Within your own experience there has been a partial displacement of print media by radio and then television, and I hardly need dwell on the anguished cries of film producers and theatre owners when it became apparent that Milton Berle was going to put the movies out of business. But adjustments were made, and continue to be made as each of the media finds new roles to play to satisfy a population with constantly increasing leisure time to fill.

It has only been in the last very few years that more than a handful of teachers have become involved in the use of television as an adjunct to their conventional teaching methods. Evidence of a growing national interest is being expressed through such organizations as your own and the National Council for the Social Studies and the National Council of Teachers of English. This is in some respects, I suppose, a matter of "if you can't beat 'em, join 'em." But I'm sure that there are more serious and encouraging reasons for the apparent change of heart in many segments of the educational community.

I don't intend today to discuss either in-school broadcasting or other instructional programs broadcast by educational television stations. Most of you know, I think, that the number of educational stations is on the rise and that the use of in-school materials has been proved of sufficient value to encourage additional installations at all grade levels.

I cannot report, however, that general educational television has yet succeeded in finding its way into enough homes each week to justify the very considerable expenditures of money, energy and imagination which have gone into it. But just as its older commercial sister has gone through many periods of change, so, I am sure, will educational television. We are all very encouraged by the recent Carnegie grant for the study of educational television. Hopefully there will emerge guidelines to help the educational broadcaster see more clearly what his objectives might be and how he can achieve them more effectively.

It is difficult to know, in talking with an audience like yourselves, where the obvious leaves off and the useful begins. As some of you know, the Television Information Office operates a special library which concerns itself with the role of television as a social force. Each year there turn to us thousands of writers, teachers, students, legislators, clergymen and others whose curiosity about television cannot be satisfied by the information to be found in critical columns or television listings. From our records, we have learned that place of residence, or occupation, or level of education are not the limiting criteria for this interest in the television medium. For that reason, I must assume that some of you, at least, will be familiar with what I have to say.

DIMENSIONS OF THE MEDIUM

I think it might be useful, however, to review for most of you the dimensions of the medium in terms of its availability and use. This will provide us with, at least, a rough frame of reference through which to look at some of the matters which have their roots in the pervasiveness of the television phenomenon.

It hardly seems possible that in 1946 there were only six stations serving 8,000 families. Today, 54 million homes, and that's 94% of all the family units in the country, are equipped to receive television. Like the two-car family, the two-set or even three- and four-set family is no longer an oddity, and the total number of sets now in use has reached 67 million.

The signals these sets are tuned to come now from 700 stations and their number is – in relative terms – growing more rapidly than the number of receivers. At present 124 stations are under construction, and applications for still another 179 are on file with the Federal Communications Commission. The day is not far off when a thousand or more stations may be operating. Of the number currently operating or contemplated, 823 will be commercial and the remaining 179 educational.

This rapid increase in stations has come about in large part through Federal legislation requiring that all sets shipped in interstate commerce be equipped to receive both VHF and UHF signals. Most of you probably are accustomed to using channels 2 through 13 – the VHF or very high frequency band. Actually, there is a second set of frequencies available, called UHF – that is, ultra high frequency. It accommodates 72 additional channels, making a total of 84.

The earliest channel assignments were almost exclusively in the lower, or VHF band. Most sets could receive only VHF signals and, when attempts were made to introduce UHF in the VHF areas, most people wouldn't spend the 30 or 40 dollars required to modify their sets to receive the new signals. In most cases the result was failure for the UHF station, and many broadcasters who had planned UHF operations turned in their construction permits before they even tried to get on the air. To keep these UHF frequencies from going to waste, the Congress, at the urging of the FCC, breathed new life into UHF with the all-channel receiver law.

Recently, the number of homes equipped to receive UHF as well as VHF has also swelled as a result of the dramatically increased interest in color television. Four or five years ago the penetration of color sets was minimal. But the number of hours devoted to color broadcasting by networks and by some stations has risen sharply and, as people have learned of this new attraction, color set sales have reached an all-time high. In fact, as some of you may have learned this Christmas, consumers are finding that they may have to wait many weeks if they wish a particularly popular model.

The manufacturing industry is, of course, rushing to extend its facilities, but there are still bottlenecks, particularly in picture tube making. All these new sets are, of course, equipped to receive the high band UHF channels. There are now about 5,000,000 color sets in use and there seems to be no reason why next year's output of sets will not be sold as it comes to market. This means that by the end of next year, 8,000,000 or 15 per cent, of U.S. families will have color sets, and therefore UHF receivers. And there are indications that by 1970, 45 per cent of all families will have color receivers. Added to black and white UHF receivers this brings the anticipated total equipped for UHF close to 80 per cent by the end of the decade.

THE INVESTMENT IN TELEVISION

The enthusiasm with which American families set out to buy their first black-and-white receivers and now their color receivers offers a good measure of the interest which this medium holds for the typical viewer. The public's purchases of television sets have already exceeded $27.5 billion (over $2.5 billion in 1965 alone). Those dollars represent an investment for home entertainment and, to a lesser extent, for other kinds of programs as well.

On the transmitting side, U. S. television networks and stations have invested nearly $800 million in equipment and literally billions in working capital, for 46,000 employees, for maintenance and, most particularly, for programs. They are spending hundreds of millions of dollars now to convert to color. All in all, as you can see, there has been a very real show of earnest money at both ends of the signal.

This cash investment is a useful yardstick for measuring the foundation on which rests the modern American phenomenon of total daily television viewing. We can derive an interesting end figure by multiplying the average number of hours during which each family uses its sets by the total number of families which own them. The year-round average is about 5 1/2 hours, and in mid-winter this rises to nearly 6 1/2. Thus we come to well over 300 million family viewing hours daily.

The average figures cannot, of course, be applied to people of all ages. Children, for example, are reported by Paul Witty to spend just over 20 hours a week before their screens. The figure falls off slightly as the youngsters grow up, because teenagers do not usually watch as much as their smaller brothers and sisters. Women tend to watch more than men. And there are, of course, all the individual differences in viewing habits which rest on education, outside interests, the availability of other entertainment and, finally, one's own taste.

No matter what your point of view, however, it is quite obvious that no other medium of entertainment has ever approached television as a leisure time attraction.

The key word here is medium. Television is only that, of course. What we are offered here is primarily a measure of people's interest in entertainment, because, by and large, most television programs are designed to entertain. Considerably fewer hours are set aside for information, religious broadcasting, news, documentaries, and other public affairs presentations than for pure amusement.

The content of the broadcast day, of course, does not remain static. If one could miraculously produce a video tape recording of an entire day's schedule from back in 1949, he would find something very different from what he sees today. Much more time is now given to news and to other non-entertainment broadcasts than 10, 15 or 20 years ago. Gone are the roller derbies, and gone, too, are some of the personalities who probably sold more television sets than any appliance salesman in the country.

VIEWER BEHAVIOR INFLUENCES SCHEDULES

But let's get back to the present, and to a factor which is weighed carefully when programs are planned. The workday and holiday behavior of viewers imposes patterns on the total schedule – patterns which to a large extent set limits on the broadcaster's program decisions.

Your own experience certainly tells you that the evening – except on weekends when important sport events are broadcast – is by far the most popular time for using television. The number of homes tuned in hour by hour is regularly measured, and what we find can be translated into percentages of total homes. Starting in the morning at 7 a.m. and ending in the late evening, we get a curve which is described by these figures – 6 per cent at 7 a.m., 17 per cent at 9 a.m., 24 per cent at 11 a.m., 29 per cent at 1 p.m., 30 per cent at 3 p.m., 40 per cent at 5 p.m., 52 per cent at 7 p.m., 67 per cent at 9 p.m. and 34 per cent at 11 p.m.

Not only does the number of homes vary considerably from hour to hour, but the composition of the audience varies as well. In early morning you find a mixed audience before the man of the family goes off to work – and mixed programming as well, including news and perhaps some material for pre-schoolers. This is followed, until late afternoon, by programs designed primarily for women.

The return of the man to his castle signals the early evening news, and the rest of the evening is given over to entertainment and informational programs which make up the bulk of the schedules until the late news. For those who still haven't had enough, there remain the late night personalities and the late movies until sign-off.

The implications of these changes throughout the day should be clear. In the first place, audiences are smaller by day than at night, and, understandably, yield considerably lower revenues to the broadcaster. Because his fixed expenses tend to remain the same, he must broadcast programs which are at the same time popular and not overly costly. It is for this reason that you see the relatively uncomplicated game shows – uncomplicated in production terms, that is – the daytime dramatic serials and re-runs of movies and off-network syndicated programs.

I should insert here one exception to the rule that daytime programs – excluding weekend sports – can be produced for modest sums. All the rulebooks go out the window when there is, for example, an astronaut launching, the visit of the Pope, or some other event of special interest which warrants full coverage regardless of the hours at which the events are taking place.

Audiences, revenues and program expenditures rise together late in the day when the early evening news comes on. News broadcasts are by no means inexpensive staples. They involve, at the network level, many hundreds of writers, technicians and reporters, to say nothing of the vast communications systems which must be brought into play to bring live reports and film or tape footage of remote events. Locally, they also require producers, newscasters, reporters, cameramen, mobile units and wire services.

To this day the networks and many stations have not learned how to present news profitably, despite the growing demand for information, and the increasing number of hours devoted to it.

TELEVISION'S PROGRAM COSTS

Most Americans are interested in the cost of things – which probably accounted for the long run of a program called The Price is Right – and I have some figures which will give you an idea of the investments that are made by broadcasters and ultimately by advertisers in their efforts to reach and hold large audiences.

Television programs are costly. Because they are seen by vast audiences, networks have to pay a great deal of money for the rights to telecast a play, and for stars who appear in it. The efforts of hundreds of persons may be needed to put a program on the air – engineers, stagehands, lighting men, makeup specialists, actors, directors, writers, etc.

A program such as Bonanza costs $187,000 – for the program alone. The total cost, which includes the program and the price charged for airtime, amounts to $311,000 for the hour – every week.

A half-hour program such as Bewitched costs $72,000 for the program, and an additional $76,000 for time.

A live program is expensive, too. The Ed Sullivan Show costs $164,000 for production, and $294,000 including the time.

And even a half-hour live panel program – To Tell the Truth – is expensive, costing $119,000 for time and talent.

The combined costs for a news program such as The Huntley-Brinkley Report total $75,000 for just 15 minutes.

In living up to their own news standards, networks made a tremendous investment. To pick up the Gemini 7 splashdown, for example, the three networks pooled resources and paid $300,000 just for the equipment and men aboard the aircraft carrier Wasp. Any single space shoot costs each network $1,000,000 – and that doesn't include the money lost through eliminating regular commercial programs.

The coverage of the 14-hour visit of Pope Paul to the United Nations last October 4th cost the networks about $1,000,000 for pooled production, and with the pre-emptions of commercial programs the costs to radio and television totaled about $5,800,000.

To pay for this continuing output of entertainment and news, the broadcaster turns to his only source of income – the advertiser. This year alone it is estimated that national, regional and local advertisers will have spent a total of just under 2 1/2 billion dollars for time and program costs. Each year this figure has gone higher, and it seems likely that by 1970 the figure will have reached 3 billion.

THE NEED FOR MASS AUDIENCES

When he invests millions of dollars, the national advertiser hopes that he will have created sufficiently interesting commercials and bought time wisely enough to engage the attention of tens of millions of viewers. He must think in these terms, since only a very small percentage of his viewers will act on his advice or yield to his persuasion. It is clear, therefore, that to accomplish his purposes, the advertiser must reach audiences as large as can reasonably be hoped for. Although certain types of programs do attract specific kinds of viewers, television advertising, on the whole, like all mass media advertising, tends to be more like a shotgun than a rifle.

If you have watched much television and have any awareness of the number of program changes that take place during the course of the year, you must be equally aware that the broadcaster's reach exceeds his grasp far more often than he would wish. The mortality rate for both new programs and old favorites attests, on the one hand, to the failure of the broadcaster to provide consistently attractive programming and, on the other, to the corollary fact that viewers have minds of their own and will often turn away from what the broadcaster may think is one of his better efforts. Unfortunately, this is most apt to happen when informational or cultural programs are presented.

The 40 per cent mortality rate for new programs in any given season means that countless hours of planning, of writing and of producing go down the drain each fall and winter, and with them, tens of millions of dollars. I don't cite these casualties and their costs to engage your sympathies. The networks and stations and independent producers who run the entrepreneurial risks involved in program development recognize that they are in an extremely hazardous business, despite which in most cases they go right back to work on new ideas for the coming season.

THE TALENT GAP

This ritual disaster, which befalls so many every autumn, points up a fact only those in the business of theatrical presentation seem to recognize – and I would include here Broadway and Hollywood producers as well as television producers. It is quite simply that the combined appetites of television, the theatre, the moving pictures and even to some extent the print media, are so great that there does not exist sufficient talent to fill all the hours on television and moving picture screens and all the stages that ring Times Square.

There was a time when traveling repertory groups and even home-grown red barn players could satisfy many local theatre buffs. But first the moving pictures, and most recently television, have conspired to raise the national level of appreciation for well-produced and well-acted performances.

It is here at this upper level of achievement that the talent shortage makes itself felt so bitterly. A few simple statistics may make clear the dimensions of the problem. In a given season, perhaps 90 plays will come to Broadway and these will involve a total of no more than 200 or 225 hours. This year Hollywood put 165 films into production. The last time a figure of this magnitude was achieved was in 1961, when 187 films went into the studios. The 1965 product, therefore, will account for some 300 hours of material, roughly half the amount that was produced in any year during the heyday of the moving pictures in the late '40's and early '50's.

Now, compare these totals with what is required for television. If we limit ourselves to only a portion of prime time, let's say two hours per evening, then the requirements of three networks amount to 42 hours a week – or nearly 2200 hours per year. I need hardly remind you that no Broadway season, and no moving picture season, has ever produced more than a very small percentage of real hits. Much theatrical product, whether for the stage or the screen, has been passable, but a very considerable portion has been slated for the junk heap.

The television problem is no different, but it is further complicated by the fact that, as a family medium, certain themes – which have been acceptable for the stage and have, increasingly, become acceptable for moving pictures – are simply not usable for broadcasting.

Another factor that must be weighed is the opportunity for the recoupment of investment. In the case of moving pictures this can be extremely tempting because of long runs, reissues and the revenues that accrue from overseas distribution. A long-running play can return to its backers many times the amount of money they invested. By December 1965, for example, Hello Dolly had already grossed over $7,500,000.

In the case of television, however, even though off-network reruns and foreign distribution offer good returns for some kinds of programs, the bait is not nearly as attractive, and the amounts of money which can be invested in any given production must be limited by the reasonable expectation of return.

A further hampering factor is the shortness of time available for the preparation of television presentations. To illustrate, a moving picture may take weeks, months or even years to produce. A Broadway play may take a year or more to write, and will then require four or five weeks of rehearsal followed by four or five weeks out of town.

But a typical television entertainment program measures rehearsal time in days, and requires of its busy writers that they turn out their work in two or three weeks. Little time is available for the endless rewrites and for the doctoring which have saved many a film and stage play from oblivion.

I have belabored these difficulties because I think it's important to base one's expectations on reality. It often seems to me remarkable that so many good things are done on television. They come off as well as they do because of the enormous talents that are poured into them, and there is no doubt that all media would be better served if there were more such talents available.

I think it's important to keep in mind that no one sets out to produce a bad Western or situation comedy or documentary. There are failures because too often the talent shortage takes its toll at either the conceptual or production level, despite the best intentions of those responsible for the original idea.

"A MODEST PROPOSAL"

There is, of course, an obvious solution to the problem – or what at first may seem an obvious solution. One can simply limit the number of broadcast hours each day and this would quite obviously have the effect of limiting the demands which television now makes on its program sources. If you think about this for a moment, however, you will agree that it is really no solution at all.

In the first place we are now much too far along in the game to turn our backs on the millions of viewers who have become accustomed to the nearly total availability of some form of television programming. For many housewives, television has become an indispensable companion, and there are, of course, many people whose working schedules are not nine to five.

Because different types of programming are required to meet a variety of needs during the day, and because the size of the available audience changes hour by hour, cutting the total number of hours would probably not relieve the tremendous demand for certain kinds of talent, and I'm afraid we would not have advanced our cause very far. Undoubtedly, there would be fewer programs which are of marginal popularity, but it does not seem to me that we could count on having a significantly greater number of programs which achieve real excellence.

Incidentally, many of these factors which I have ticked off in relation to talent availability have direct bearing on the question of pay television, which has been suggested by many as the way to meet certain special needs of limited sectors within the total viewing population. I am convinced, as are many others, that there is practically no talent which has been left untapped in the search for usable broadcast materials. The fact of paying for programs would not bring into being a new corps of writers, actors and producers, without whom, of course, new kinds of programming would be impossible. From experiments which have already been made in Canada and this country, it would appear that the only programs people will pay for regularly are movies and sports.

TELEVISION WILL NOT STAND STILL

Much of what I have said may seem to you a special pleading for the status quo. It is not meant to be so, and even if it were, it would be a pleading in what must be a lost cause. In the 20 years since television began its emergence as a major communications force, it has already undergone far too many changes to offer any promise of standing pat.

A simple comparison of the most popular programs of ten years ago with those which find favor today makes this abundantly clear. Who would have dreamed 15 years ago that an hour or even an hour and a half of news would be presented by most stations each evening? Could we have envisioned the tremendous technical capability which has made possible the coverage of events ranging from the national political conventions to the astronaut launchings? Who but an electronics scientist could have foreseen the globe-girdling Telstar relays?

Two factors have worked together to make some of these changes possible. Greater financial resources have led to better equipment, which permits technical accomplishments that were far beyond the industry's reach even half a dozen years ago. And world events have heightened interest in information generally and have made it possible to hold the attention of viewers with programming which would have gone almost unnoticed in the past.

The very nature of the audience itself is undergoing slow modification. To the extent that education conditions one's tastes and needs and preferences, the rising level of formal educational achievement suggests the possibility that there may develop a greater acceptance of certain kinds of program material which have in the past enjoyed very limited popularity.

I have already spoken of the increasing competition which will grow out of the increasing number of stations in operation. It would be pleasant to infer from this the promise of new and marvelous program developments. However, given the limited supply of first class talent, the tastes and program preferences of most viewers, and the economic facts of broadcasting life, I don't think we have cause for great optimism. But certainly there will, as always, be innovation – not so much because there are more stations as because someone, somewhere has had a fresh idea.

This year, for the first time, we have seen the large-scale development of mass audience participation, in programs about automobile driving, citizenship and health. Similar programs have been produced by local stations to deal with problems such as urban transportation. More are being prepared by networks and stations, and just how long they will be intriguing to viewers remains to be seen. They may come and go as other program types have, or they may find a permanent place within the total schedule.

The advent of color, like the earlier development of larger screens, promises greater educational and entertainment values in the kinds of programs which can best capitalize on this new dimension in presentation. But the shaping of a medium in terms of its content and the levels of tastes which it expresses rests not with the medium so much as with its users.

It is no accident that so little of your daily newspaper is devoted to news and so much is devoted to entertainment. It is the reader who has made that decision. And it is equally the reader or the viewer who has shaped general and special interest magazines as well as moving pictures and the stage.

The challenge which the broadcaster must face and has always had to face is how to meet the quite clearly defined desires of the majority, while spicing his schedule with innovations that may find mass audiences in their turn.

TELEVISION'S EFFECTS ON VIEWERS

Now some words of caution – or perhaps they will seem reassuring to some of you. There has been much speculation about the effects of television and many claims have been made about its capacity to uplift or degrade, to inform or confuse, to create new attitudes or reinforce old beliefs. A careful reading of existing research makes it clear that there is still much to learn, but we have begun to recognize that the viewer himself largely determines the effects of the medium.

When we are exposed to mass media – and I would include here print as well as visual media – each of us sets out to protect his preconceptions. First, we select what we will see. Then, we perceive selectively by blocking information or even emotional content which is undesirable to us. Finally, we tend to remember only what we can fit comfortably into our previous notions, the content that reinforces our views.

A perfect example of this occurs during most election campaigns. We listen to the candidates we prefer in order to reinforce our belief in them. We listen to the opposition far less often, and generally to scoff or criticize. The importance of the Great Debates in 1960 was, first, that they broke down the selective exposure factor. But second, and more important, the reinforcement factor came into play, and caused many regular Democrats to shift from near neutrality about Kennedy to a more active acceptance of him. In other words, they found support for their underlying belief that the Democratic candidate was worth working for, or at least voting for.

Contrary to the belief of many of television's supporters and detractors, it doesn't sell goods by converting people from one point of view to another. Instead, it offers them ways to achieve whatever they already desire, although in some better or faster or safer or more economical or easier way.

Even children, whom we think of as little blank slates, are by no means putty in the hands of the broadcaster. The psychologists who have worked in this area seem to agree that television works on the child only through a welter of other and more powerful factors: the family, school, friends and church.

THE TEACHER'S AND CITIZEN'S OPPORTUNITY

Where does all this leave you as teachers and as citizens? It seems clear to me, first, that you have an immediate opportunity to join in shaping this new medium. The challenge you face is that of encouraging in your students an appreciation of what is good. On you rests part of the responsibility for helping your students to develop useful critical attitudes.

Louis Forsdale, professor of English at Columbia University's Teachers College, has spoken of the need for teachers to raise the level of literacy in the new media, as well as in print. He suggests that the medium of television be studied as a medium, and not just as an audio-visual tool and notes that in Scandinavia schools are required to give at least one hour's instruction per week about film and/or television. He recently said, "We study literature, not to create professional writers... we study music, not to create professional musicians. And we should study television, not to create television professionals, but to raise our students up the ladder of literacy in this new medium."

Every day you face young people who have shared with each other, and perhaps with you, the common experience of watching television the previous evening. Will you let that shared experience go by the board, or will you seek the means – as many of your colleagues in the Social Studies and English fields are doing – to put it to good use as grist for your own mills?

Are there programs on the air that are particularly useful? Let the broadcaster know about them.

Do you want the counsel of broadcast professionals? Most will be glad to help.

Are your students realistic about the career opportunities which television offers? Go to the professionals for guidance.

Do you need more advance program information than you're able to find in your local newspapers or other listings? Let us, at TIO, hear from you.

There is much to be done by all of us to improve television and teaching. To get on with our jobs, we must take advantage of every opportunity that comes our way. Television will be shaped far more by its viewers than by broadcasters. You can play your part in that process, and we hope you will.

Middle-Aged Meliorists

"You appear to be publishing a middle-aged magazine for middle-aged readers," scoffed one reader after a look at the advance galleys of a new quarterly, The Public Interest. On thinking it over, Editors Daniel Bell, 46, and Irving Kristol, 45, took the crack as a compliment. "Young people tend to be enchanted by glittering generalities," they wrote in their first issue last fall; "older people are inclined to remember rather than to think; and middle-aged people, seasoned by life but still open to the future, do seem to us—in our middle years—to be the best of all political generations."

Concrete Critics. With their second issue, which appeared last week, Bell and Kristol continue their reasoned dialogue with reasonable middle age. Articles range from the obsolescence of U.S. public schools to the trend toward small business in the U.S. economy to the theoretical and practical relationship between men and computerized "thinking" machines. First-rate social critics in their own right, Bell and Kristol have years of experience editing and contributing to such magazines as Commentary, Encounter and FORTUNE. They hope that The Public Interest will provide politicians with the latest insights of the intellectual community, while giving intellectuals an understanding of the process of government.

Friends since their undergraduate days at the City College of New York, where they both developed a boundless disdain for ideologies of both the right and left, the two editors emphasize fact and information in their magazine, avoid simplistic political stances. "Too many intellectuals," writes Kristol in the current Public Interest, "express decided views on automation, disarmament, urban renewal, and all sorts of other matters on which they are inadequately informed." Adds Bell: "If the function of the intellectual is to criticize, I say to the intellectual: specify—translate ideas into concrete programs."

No Carping. Like most other "little" magazines, The Public Interest is not likely to become self-supporting in the near future. But Bell and Kristol, who now rely on backing from Wall Street, and other friends, are pleased by the early response; they estimate a circulation of 5,000 or more at $1.50 a copy. A professor of sociology at Columbia University, Bell commissions most of the stories, for which the authors are paid a token $100; Kristol, executive vice president of Basic Books, does most of the editing. Their magazine, they hope, will re-create some of the atmosphere of 19th century England when intellectuals took a passionate interest in their government, and were not satisfied merely to carp contentiously from the sidelines. "We are not interested in the ordinary exposé," says Kristol. "We are incurable meliorists. We think that the people in Washington are doing as good a job as anybody can. They would do an even better one if they were given all the information."

Dixie Flamethrowers

After learning that Senator Robert F. Kennedy was planning to address the University of Mississippi Law School in mid-March, Columnist Tom Ethridge of the Jackson Clarion-Ledger expounded on Southern hospitality. "It is hoped that Mississippi authorities can guarantee the safety of Senator Kennedy when and if he visits Oxford," Ethridge wrote. "Or is it really possible to guarantee anyone's personal safety here or anywhere else? There are men in our state who might take fantastic risks to get even for the 1962 military occupation of Oxford by federal troops. We do not predict an attempt on R.F.K.'s life, but merely suggest that it could happen with no end of unfortunate repercussions for our state and people."

For the Jackson press to show such solicitude for the health and welfare of a Kennedy was novel indeed. The biggest papers in Mississippi, with a combined circulation of 120,000, the morning Clarion-Ledger and the afternoon Daily News indulge in more Yankee-baiting and race-baiting than any other papers in the South. During the Watts rioting, Ethridge wrote: "What the cops need . . . are plenty of flamethrowers . . . Nothing could stop bloodthirsty savages quicker than reducing them to cinders."

JACKSON CLARION-LEDGER

TOM HEDERMAN JR. — BOB HEDERMAN JR.

The second coming of Babbitt.

Jested Daily News Editor Jimmy Ward on the front page: "Did you hear about the Negro marine who is serving his country well in Viet Nam? He received a telegram on the battlefield which read: 'We regret to inform you that your mother and father were killed "in action" in Los Angeles.' " When a Mississippi anti-poverty program folded, Ward bade farewell to the "slew-footed, unsoaped ragtag of human flotsam who were roaming Mississippi to create hate and provoke a killing."

Unabashed Boosterism. Many Southern papers now cover local racial news with considerable accuracy and balance. The Jackson papers, which were founded in the 1800s, have not changed their attitude in half a century. Bob Hederman, who publishes both papers, and his cousin Tom Hederman, who edits the Clarion-Ledger, are descendants of the powerful Jackson family that bought the Clarion-Ledger in 1920, took over the Daily News in 1954, and has always quickly crunched any competition. The Hedermans also own the Hattiesburg (Miss.) American, a sizable chunk of local real estate and an interest in TV and radio in Jackson. They are quite content with things as they are in Mississippi—which does not mean they believe everything they read in their own newspapers. On the contrary, they are considered to be reasonably malleable Mississippians who go along with segregation because that's what the community seems to want. To them, the newspapers are, above all, a highly profitable business venture.

In addition to championing segregation, the two Jackson papers practice a boosterism that would make a Babbitt blush. The Clarion-Ledger regularly runs a Page One color photo of a local maiden or matron gushing something like "It is patio time again." The Daily News runs a front-page cartoon of a donkey named Hinny who brays verse on behalf of some local cause: "It's the first night for football in the high schools of the state/ And ol' Hinny hopes each one'll win its game—won't that be great."

Too Close to Criticize. Exasperated at not being able to get to see Governor Paul Johnson, Los Angeles Times Reporter Jack Nelson asked the Clarion-Ledger's political reporter Charles Hills why he didn't raise some "hell" with the Governor. "Oh, no," replied Hills, "I worked so hard for him in the campaign I can't afford to criticize him now." When it comes to past political figures, however, the papers are less sensitive. "Speaking of John Wilkes Booth, history may have done him wrong," Tom Ethridge wrote recently. "Mrs. Lincoln had accused Honest Abe of flirting with a cute actress in the play he was watching. There was an argument. Mary Lincoln drew a .44 derringer from her handbag and fired the fatal shot. John Wilkes Booth happened to pass the presidential box at that moment. Being a true Southern gentleman, he gallantly took the rap for the first lady."

Court Upholds Plea by Negroes For Voice on TV License Renewal

3/26/66 NEWS MEDIA

By FRED P. GRAHAM

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 25—The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled today that Negro citizens in Jackson, Miss., must be given a hearing on their charges of racial discrimination in broadcasting by a local television station.

The ruling was described as "a very sweeping decision" by Henry Geller, general counsel to the Federal Communications Commission. It was the first court ruling requiring the commission to allow members of the public at large to challenge renewals of broadcasting licenses.

It is expected to have implications far beyond the racial charges in Mississippi.

The charges against station WLBT-TV included assertions that it carried disproportionate amounts of commercials and entertainment. Thus, the decision opens the door for challenges by viewers to stations' programming.

Previously, the commission refused to allow members of the public to dispute a station's license renewal except when electrical interference or economic injury was alleged.

Accordingly, the commission declined to order a hearing in 1964 when two Mississippi civil rights leaders, Aaron Henry and Robert L. T. Smith, and the United Church of Christ opposed WLTB's application for a three-year renewal of its license. The church is a national Protestant denomination with a large membership in the area.

Among the charges was a complaint over an editorial rights leaders, Aaron Henry broadcast at the time of the University of Mississippi integration crisis in 1962 that declared:

"The word of the hour, the word of the day, the word of the years is: Never!"

There were also complaints that the station's weather reports occasionally ended with the prediction: "Tomorrow, cloudy with demonstrators."

The complainants also contended that the station discriminated against local activities of the Roman Catholic Church.

When no other party appeared to oppose the license renewal, the F.C.C. voted 4 to 2, in favor of a one-year probationary renewal.

Since then, radical changes have been made in its racial programming.

Negroes are now addressed as "Mr." and "Mrs." on the air. Negro ministers are now included among those broadcasting devotionals, and Negro youths participate in a Saturday afternoon high school show called "Teen Tempo."

The decision today left it to the commission to decide whether the station should be credited with these changes when the hearings are held.

The opinion by Judge Warren E. Burger said that the F.C.C. had misconstrued a Supreme Court decision of 1940 by granting "standing" in contested license renewals only to those who were economically involved.

F.C.C. Theory Ruled Out

In the 1940 case, the Court granted such standing to persons who were affected economically.

"The theory that the commission can always effectively represent the listener interests in a renewal proceeding without the aid and participation of legitimate listener representatives," Judge Burger said, "is no longer a valid assumption which stands up under the realities of actual experience."

"Unless the listeners — the broadcasting consumers — can be heard, there may be no one to bring programming deficiencies or offensive overcommercialization to the attention of the commission in an effective manner," he said.

The decision today gives the commission broad discretion to decide who from among the public shall be allowed to participate in hearings. It mentioned civic organizations, professional societies, unions and churches as groups that should be heard.

'Pious Hope' Deplored

The court chided the commission for its "pious hope" that WLBT might mend its ways if it were given a one-year extension. It suggested that the commission might have taken the station off the air and opened the channel to new applicants.

The other judges joining in the unanimous opinion were Carl McGowan and Edward Allen Tamm.

According to Mr. Geller, the full commission will decide whether to appeal the case to the Supreme Court, based upon his recommendation, which should be prepared in about three weeks.

Any decision to appeal would be subject to a final determination by Solicitor General Thurgood Marshall, he said.

If the commission decides not to appeal, the hearing should get under way in about three months, he said.

The Lamar Life Insurance Company of Jackson owns WLBT-TV and was also a defendant in the appeal.

A spokesman for the station said that no comment would be made until officials had an opportunity to study the decision.

MOBILE NEWSPAPER SOLD TO NEWHOUSE

NBMS MEDIA 10/8/66

MOBILE, Ala., Oct. 6 (AP) —Controlling stock in The Press and The Register, Mobile newspapers, has been acquired by S. I. Newhouse of New York.

Mr. Newhouse, owner of a chain of newspapers including two others in Alabama, purchased 53 per cent of the stock from the McGowan-Aldridge voting trust. The proposed sale of the stock of the Mobile Press Register, Inc., was announced in June.

Terms of the multimillion-dollar transaction, which was closed Wednesday, were not announced. The company also publishes The Sunday Press Register.

Kenneth R. Giddens, Mobile television and radio executive, earlier had acquired 50 per cent of the stock in WKRG television and radio stations of Mobile from the newspaper company.

The Federal Communications Commission said the stock was being purchased for $2.25-million. Mr. Giddens already owned 50 per cent of the WKRG stock.

Mr. Newhouse announced in Mobile that no policy or personnel changes would be made in the afternoon Press and morning Register.

R. B. Chandler is publisher of the papers, William J. Hearin is co-publisher, executive vice president and general manager, and George M. Cox is executive editor and secretary.

The Mobile company owns The Mississippi Press in Pascagoula. Mr. Newhouse also owns controlling interest in The Birmingham News and The Huntsville Times, both Alabama evening dailies.

HOUSTON'S SHACKLED PRESS

by Ben H. Bagdikian NEWS MEDIA

AMONG the most fervent declarations about American institutions are public testaments to the need for freedom of the press, and no one pronounces these with more passion than the press itself. From standing mottoes on page one, in prose and poetry across editorial pages, and in unrelenting rhetoric from publishers' conventions comes the message: the democratic process is founded on the rock of free and independent newspapers.

Most of these calls imply the danger of control by government. Some suggest other threats, from welfare statism to public apathy. Over the years, among the most insistent alarmists of the internal threat to freedom has been the Houston Chronicle, the largest paper in Texas and at one time the property of Jesse Jones. But so far in this decade the greatest contribution the Houston Chronicle has made to the maintenance of native American institutions is to conduct a continuing and depressing demonstration on how not to operate a free paper in a free society, and to remind its brethren in the trade that the most immediate threat to a free press in this country is their own conflict of interest.

In the 1950s the Chronicle was an unabashed mouthpiece for the city's aging oligarchy, dull, jingoistic, reactionary, and falling behind its competitors. Brought in to rejuvenate the paper in 1960 was William P. Steven, a professional editor (moderate Republican) who reversed the paper's dying tendencies and looked at the Chronicle as though it were being published for the whole community. In addition to this heresy, he was pretty radical: he supported higher education, Lyndon Johnson, and civil rights. So last September he was fired by the oligarchy. It was the most spectacular story in American newspapering that week, reported in all major Texas dailies, the wire services, and national newsmagazines. But in the Chronicle's account of its change — the conservative team of the 1950s was put back in charge — Steven's name did not appear, and he became an unperson in the manner of fallen political gods in the Soviet encyclopedia. The paper began shifting back to the right.

When a big and powerful newspaper fires its hard-driving editor, then changes hands only to reverse the change a few months later, that's news — but barely so to the newspaper in question. Mr. Bagdikian, Washington-based author and reporter, needed weeks of intensive querying and checking to get at the facts about the policies and the goings-on of the owners of the Houston CHRONICLE. The results have great relevance to the state of the free press.

Three months later the oligarchs agreed to sell the Chronicle to the Houston oil millionaire John Mecom as part of an $85 million package that included hotels, banks, office buildings, and a laundry. The deal would change the commercial power structure of the sixth largest city in the country, but the Chronicle's bland story was one eighth as long as the one in the opposition Post. After Mecom moved in, the paper continued its rightward shift and changed largely by playing up its new proprietor's interest in oil, horse and automobile racing, and providing spectacular coverage of his daughter's wedding.

On June 7 of this year the Mecom deal collapsed, and the Chronicle reverted to the oligarchy, along with the laundry. Apparently the deal fell through over disagreement on the final price for the biggest bank in the package. The Chronicle did not report that the deal had been canceled, let alone why, presumably on grounds that it was none of the public's business. Readers were not even told that they had lost a newspaper proprietor. Mecom's name, like Steven's before him, was merely dropped from the masthead and replaced by that of Jesse Jones, who has been dead ten years. If Houstonians depended on their biggest paper, they would not know that their community had undergone a profound change, even though the paper was part of that change. And they would not know that their leading newspaper, the most prominent Texas representative of that crucial institution of a free and independent press, was being bought and sold like an anonymous link in a string of corporate hot dogs. On the basis of that record, the Chronicle's readers will probably have to rely on rumor and gossip to tell them what happens next to their newspaper.

Among the depressing morals to be drawn from the turbulence in Houston is the reminder that the American press has hardly begun to think about, let alone solve, a fundamental problem of conflict of interest. The press has been vigorous about pointing to conflict of interest among politicians, occasionally exposing men and agencies in government who let private profit interfere with their public duty. Newspapers were particularly noticeable stressing the horrors of conflict of interest and payola in broadcasting. At infrequent times a few papers will even expose individual reporters or editors who compromise their reportorial objectivity by taking money, favors, or glory from news sources. But they have been virtually silent about a major source of conflict of interest in journalism: the danger that the publisher of a local paper will have a financial interest in an enterprise that should be reported objectively but is not.

"Copyright © 1966, by Ben H. Bagdikian"

For example, the group that controlled the Chronicle last year also controlled a large bank in town which experienced a bitter stockholder struggle that was reported in the Wall Street Journal and on page one of the opposition Post, but never mentioned in the Chronicle.

So it was typical that when the Chronicle was sold last December, along with the same large bank and downtown real estate, Houstonians depending solely on the Chronicle would have known nothing of the event unless they had caught the final edition of the December 6 paper, and even there they would have been limited to a twelve-and-a-half-inch story. Six months later when it was "unsold," the readers were told nothing. The Post had three chaste paragraphs forty-eight hours later.

The Post has not always compensated for the deficiencies of the Chronicle. It cooperated, for example, in keeping out of print in Houston the name and fate of the discharged Steven. Competition does not necessarily produce good newspapers. There are too many cities where it seems to produce the opposite — Boston, San Francisco, the afternoon papers in New York City — and a number of places where monopolies print good newspapers — Louisville and St. Petersburg. Competition merely increases the odds that news will be printed and public questions asked and investigated. There is no longer competition in 96 percent of American cities with papers, and in the remaining 4 percent the tide of monopoly seems to move on inexorably, as it has in Houston in recent times.

UNTIL 1964 there had been three papers in the city. For years, the best one was Oveta Culp Hobby's morning Post, staid, occasionally enterprising, but never as vigorous or as authoritative as one would expect from the only morning paper in the country's sixth largest and remarkably rich city. There were two afternoon papers. The Scripps-Howard Press, a wretched paper, was a flamboyant, superficial jab in the civic rib cage. The other was the Chronicle, reactionary and stingy with the news, for years the voice of its early owner, Jesse Jones, and after his death, of his fiscal trustees.

In 1960 the Press had a circulation of 102,000. The Post, with 218,000 and the only staff exhibiting signs of metropolitan-caliber ability, grew slowly to dominance in the city. The Chronicle had a circulation of 205,000, but it was out of sympathy and out of touch with large segments of the community. John T. Jones, Jr., the titular head of the Chronicle, decided it was time for a change. Jones, the favorite nephew of Jesse Jones, is tall, slender, slow-speaking, with a facial resemblance to his uncle except for a contemplative quality.

John Jones decided to change the Chronicle to a paper for a modern metropolis, which Houston desperately needed. For years the city had been wracked by ideological wars of the most primitive kind, most dramatically in its educational system. The schools were dominated by citizens who regarded sympathetic mention of the United Nations in the classroom as Communist indoctrination, racial integration as an alien plot, and who eschewed such forms of federal aid as school lunches but grasped it in the form of federally supported military training for high school boys.

Jones's instrument for the awakening of the Chronicle was William P. Steven, a man of heavy build and hearty voice, with a national reputation for rejuvenating newspapers. He had started out in his native Wisconsin, had edited in Tulsa, and had enlivened the Minneapolis news scene. He is of that breed of newspapermen who possess instinctive rapport with their generation, a drive to go where the action is, and an immunity from the contagion of bureaucracy and ultrarespectability.

Like his friend Lyndon Johnson, Steven is a calculating plunger. (Years ago he told a Time magazine reporter that his editing philosophy is "Plan now, print later," but it came out in Time as "Print now, plan later" and continues unchangeable in the corridors of Time as a famous Steven quote.) He parted with the Cowles management in Minneapolis largely because young John Cowles had risen to the point of editorial leadership, and a good newspaper can stand only one leader at a time. It is typical of Steven's shrewd enthusiasm that he found his next job by compiling a list of all the papers in the country with three characteristics: big enough to pay him a good salary, dull, and with an editor over sixty. There were eight. In each case he arranged for a friend who knew the owners to let the publisher know Steven was a good man and available. One of the papers was the Chronicle.

In September of 1960 John Jones and Steven spent a day and a half talking in a room of the Rice Hotel in Houston. Jones wanted Steven to do for the Chronicle what he had done for papers in Tulsa and Minneapolis, make them interesting and make them grow. The two men liked each other. As they approached a decision, Steven told Jones, "You know, John, there is one thing that troubles me about working in the South that you ought to know. I feel that integration is an essential fact in the demonstration of democracy. I think it is necessary for the full development of the economy. And I think it is the only way to make our foreign policy mean anything in a world of mostly dark skins. Outside of that, I have no strong feelings on the matter."

As Steven remembers it, Jones replied, "The Chronicle supports the law of the land. The only trouble I'll have with you is that you may want to talk about it too much."

The Chronicle stopped being dull and archaic. Emphasis moved from columnists of the far right, like Paul Harvey and Fulton Lewis, Jr., to those of the center, like James Reston and Max Freedman. The paper subscribed to the Los Angeles Times–Washington Post wire service and the New York Times News Service (after the Times service appeared, conservatives in town began calling the Chronicle their Pravda).

Almost at once Steven began building the local news staff, which was suffering from inbreeding, age, and malnutrition. Top reporters at the Chronicle in 1960 were getting $120 a week, and he raised their salaries to $165. He attracted bright young journalists from outside to the paper. One photographer, Ted Rozumalski, became the only man ever to be named twice as national Photographer of the Year. Reporter William Porterfield won an Ernie Pyle Award in 1963. Saul Friedman was named a Nieman Fellow at Harvard. The staff began doing a series of articles on urgent local problems, among them sympathetic accounts of the nature of racial relations in the city (there are 300,000 Negroes in a city of a million). Much attention was devoted to the need for faster development of higher education. The Chronicle withdrew its support from the conservatives on the school board, pressed for televising of school-board proceedings against the bitter opposition of conservatives, and won.

Steven spent money, but he also saved some. For years it had cost the paper $100,000 to publish a 6 A.M. edition merely to get an extra 7000 circulation in the fight against the Post. Steven scrapped that edition. In 1964 the Press finally gave up and sold its assets to the Chronicle, which then became the largest paper in Texas, with 254,000 circulation.

The opposition Post began to perk up. It brought down William Woestendiek from the highly successful Long Island Newsday, and its national and foreign news improved. The changes were long overdue in a city with four universities (total enrollment 25,000), a large petrochemical and shipping community with global rather than parochial interests, and the huge NASA space center.

For the first time, urgent issues could be discussed openly without destructive recrimination. The pre-Steven Chronicle spoke for the financial lords of the territory and their eccentric politics, and everyone knew it; the most dangerous political radicalism it had entertained was to support Governor John Connally, even though he is, in a manner of speaking, a Democrat.

A man who lived and worked in Houston during the Steven period said, "You have no idea what a difference it made that the Chronicle changed. It wasn't dangerous to be a Johnson Democrat anymore, or to support minority groups, or speak in favor of Medicare. Before, if you supported these things, they made you feel like the village crazy man."

The nature of this change is implied in the award given Steven in October of 1964 by the Houston chapter of the American Jewish Committee "in recognition of his constructive and effective labors in guiding the Houston Chronicle toward accomplishing the information of our populace and the improvement of opinion in Houston."

It was typical of the new role of the paper that on September 2, 1965, Steven and his counterpart on the Post, William Hobby, Jr., spent much of the day conferring with Houston Mayor Louie Welch over an alarming local development. It was during the Watts rebellion in Los Angeles, and though Houston Negroes showed no sign of hostility, hysterical whites had bought out all the guns in a number of stores and were mounting armed patrols of neighborhoods. Steven put in continual calls for his boss, John Jones, and for his managing editor, Everett Collier, but, oddly, could not reach either one.

Steven arrived home tired and worried, but his wife, Lucy, an alert and articulate blonde, insisted that he shake his concern and join a family celebration. It was a gay evening. But by eleven thirty Bill and Lucy were in bed reading when John Jones called and said that he was coming right up. Bill assumed that Jones wanted to talk about the racial tension.

Just before midnight, Mr. and Mrs. Jones arrived at the Steven home in the fashionable southwest of Houston. Bill and Lucy were in bathrobes and over an initial drink made friendly small talk. Then Jones blurted out: "This is the hardest thing I ever had to do. Bill, they had a meeting today, and they got you."

As Bill and Lucy Steven reconstruct it, the conversation went like this:

Steven: Who is "they"? And what do you mean, they got me?

Jones: You know. The Endowment.

Lucy: Who?

Lucy: What do you mean, they got Bill?

Jones: You're all through, Bill.

Lucy: Why? Why?

There was no direct answer. Much later that night, Jones said: "Bill, you had a vision. They don't want a vision; they want a voice."

The Endowment is The Houston Endowment, Incorporated, a tax-free charitable foundation started by Jesse Jones in 1937 with a gift of $1,050,000. Jesse Jones, banking, lumber, and real estate millionaire and a government administrator under Herbert Hoover and Franklin Roosevelt, died in 1956. Today his Endowment calculates its assets at $168 million. Others think it is $400 million, but no outside audit has ever been made.

Under the law, the Endowment exists solely to support charities. But its primary impact on the community is as a powerful, tightly held corporate force. It has an important interest in thirty-two corporations, a majority interest in twenty-five, including half a dozen banks, three hotels, several downtown office buildings, real estate, and the Mayfair House hotel on Park Avenue, New York. Through its communications properties it has been the major controller of political and social intelligence in the city of Houston. At the start of the counterrevolution that swept Bill Steven out of his job, the tax-free foundation owned 100 percent of KTRH Broadcasting Company, a major station in the city, 31 percent of a local television station, and 100 percent of the Houston Chronicle.

From 1951 to 1964 the Endowment had an income of $97 million and gave $19 million in charity. When Representative Wright Patman of Texas began investigating abuses by some tax-free foundations, the Internal Revenue Service momentarily revoked the Endowment's foundation status but later restored it.

Four men and one woman controlled probably the largest single corporate force in the city. John Jones used to be a sixth trustee and chairman of the board, but he resigned last August, in order, he said, to buy $3 million worth of broadcasting properties from the Endowment without conflict of interest. The remaining five trustees are all related to Jesse Jones by blood, marriage, or former business association. They are J. Howard Creekmore, president, a former bank employee of Jones's; Mrs. Audrey Jones Beck, granddaughter of Jesse; John Beck, her husband; J. Hurt Garrett, a former employee of Jones's and now senior vice president of the Texas National Bank of Commerce, second largest bank in the city, controlled by the Endowment; and W. W. Moore, former associate of Jesse Jones's, now president of Bankers Mortgage Company, a holding company owned 97 percent by the Endowment.

There is special irony in the episode. Reformers of newspapers have long dreamed of ownership by a foundation that would be immune to commercial attitudes and pressures. But as it unfolded in Houston, foundation ownership produced a list of almost every pitfall in business domination. This does not necessarily negate the idea of foundation support, but it would seem to for foundations run by men who are essentially corporate administrators with control of operating businesses. For example, the Chronicle represented only one twentieth of the Endowment's total assets. Even if the newspaper never showed a profit, this would be tolerable to the total economy of the foundation. It served the trustees instead to have the paper protect the property and politics of its owners and do it more effectively by overwhelming its competing papers, which it did by consistently cutting its advertising rates secretly for big advertisers, keeping its monthly subscription rate abnormally low, running exorbitant editions to help put one competitor out of business and dominate another. The owners of the Chronicle had another convenience: they held notes for some time on the owners of the Post.

The chief evil of the Endowment's ownership is the same as that of any business conglomerate possessing a newspaper: the paper is always in danger of becoming a means to the parent corporation's nonjournalistic ends, a handmaiden rather than a detached reporter.

A second danger is that such ownership is ideological. A man who controls a dozen nonjournalistic businesses usually has nothing in his experience telling him he is obliged to make his property available to the ideas of others. The owners of the Chronicle seemed to find any such notion of obligation intolerable, and Steven insists he was fired because of that intolerance. "The conservatives won," he says.

As he cleaned out his desk, Steven got a call from President Johnson, who wanted to know what was going on. "Mr. President," Steven said, "we carried every precinct but the right one." He meant that the paper had support from the community but not from the boardroom of the Houston Endowment in the Bankers Mortgage Building. It was from here that the counterrevolution was mounted. First the foundation trustees dissolved the board of the Chronicle, which had included Steven, replacing him with their new editor, Collier, who had been a columnist during the paper's reactionary period in the 1950s. Then they loaded the paper's board with members of the foundation board — Creekmore, Garrett, Moore, and John Beck.

Jones seems to have been a powerless witness to the wreckage of his paper. He has said that he was told to take it or leave it.

There was almost unanimous indignation among the new hierarchy of the paper at reports that politics of the paper had anything to do with the firing. I tried to ask all the trustees, but most of them were unapproachable. The receptionist for Mr. Moore at Bankers Mortgage brought back the message "He knows what you want, and he won't see you." But I found the number two man on the board less bashful. J. Hurt Garrett has his office on the executive third floor of the Endowment's Texas National Bank of Commerce (the biggest bank it controls). He is an elderly jowl-faced man reminiscent of veteran overseers of New England textile mills.

"We didn't like their editorial policy, that's all," he said. "They had everyone up in arms. Nobody liked it. I never heard anything but complaints about it. . . . It was all this racial desegregation business. Things were all right in Houston before they came down. But all this racial business — nobody liked it. And I don't like all this Johnson stuff, and all his civil rights, too. I know that Jones and Steven are friends of Johnson, but all we got was complaints about the paper's policy on that."

Mr. Garrett sounded quite credible. When he said of the paper's policy, "Nobody liked it," presumably he meant nobody on the third floor of the Texas National Bank of Commerce. Two thirds of Harris County voted for Lyndon Johnson in 1964. And when he said he heard nothing but complaints, this, too, sounded plausible. My guess is that he does not subscribe to a Houston weekly called The Forward Times, which goes mostly to the Negro community, and which ran almost a full-page editorial on the firing of Bill Steven, saying:

> A strong positive force that has quietly but effectively gone about the business of helping Houston Negro citizens move up into new heights of dignity and opportunity has been fired from his position.
> Not many Negroes were personally acquainted with William P. Stevens [The Forward Times made a common error of putting a terminal "s" on the name], but most were well aware of the fact that for the last four years The Houston Chronicle had shifted from a staunchly conservative newspaper to one that openly advocated school integration and printed editorials that warmed the heart of the depressed and disadvantaged.
> What the Negro citizens did not know was the man responsible for all this change was William P. Stevens, backed by John T. Jones, Jr. What they may not have realized recently, when a front-page announcement was run in the Chronicle announcing that a new editor had been hired was that the old editor, William P. Stevens, had been fired. . . . It is an ominous warning of things to come or to say the least it is an indication of the end of a short, short era.

The editorial referred to the possibility that people in Houston might not know that Steven had been fired. On September 3 the Chronicle ran a large story on page one on the new appointments but omitted any mention of Steven, and of the Endowment, which made the changes. Over at the Post a story about the firing was prepared but killed by the top brass.

So the news of Steven's discharge had to travel by underground: two church newsletters (one said "truly disturbing," another "a tragic mistake"), two weeklies (The Forward Times and the conservative weekly, Tribune, which ran a straightforward news story). Later someone mailed out thousands of reproductions of stories in national papers and newsmagazines on a sheet entitled "News all over the U.S. but not in Houston."

JOHN MECOM, the new owner of the Chronicle, inherited all its problems, and some of them were even magnified. Under the previous ownership, when a columnist in the Chronicle had mentioned in print that there was a plan to study a downtown air terminal, the head of the Endowment, Howard Creekmore, personally called the paper in anger. The Endowment also owned the Rice Hotel, where most of the airlines have their offices. A new downtown terminal was not encouraged in the Chronicle.

Under Mecom the Rice Hotel was still owned by the owner of the Chronicle, who still had a controlling interest in the bank. In addition, Mecom has worldwide oil, industrial, hotel, and banking interests, and in the Houston area he owns the Warwick Hotel, the Reed Roller Bit Company, the Keystone Drug Company, a building construction firm, a half interest in a huge industrial complex on the Houston Ship Channel, and 20,000 acres of land, some of which he is using to construct 5000 homes and high-rise apartments. The possibility of a conflict of interest was as inherent under Mecom's ownership of the Chronicle as it was under its previous owners. But the Houston Endowment had been under pursuit by the Department of the Treasury and by Congressman Patman. Patman was digging deeper into the Endowment in the summer and fall of 1965, compiling an impressive record, only partly publicized at the time, of the Endowment's large-scale corporate dealings and its modest indulgence in charity. Patman proposed and even the conservative Treasury agreed that there ought to be a law limiting the right of tax-free foundations to control operating businesses.

During this period, the foundation was looking for a suitable buyer, Steven was fired, and Creekmore decided that John Mecom was the man to buy the Chronicle. Why did they pick him?

Collier's explanation is: "The trustees of Houston Endowment were determined to keep these properties in the hands of someone who has the same deep love of this community and the same concepts for its betterment and progress that Jesse Jones had." The trustees no doubt felt they were expressing "the same concepts for its betterment and progress" when they fired Steven for being too liberal, too pro-Negro, and too militant a reporter of the town.

Mecom is pro-Johnson in a Texas sort of way, but he is not an ideologue. He maintained an office in the Chronicle and ran the same kind of paper the post-Steven editors did under the Endowment. The paper remained to the right of the Steven paper. Three months after Mecom took over, its columnists on domestic affairs were William White, Henry J. Taylor, Raymond Moley, Les Carpenter, Marianne Means, Victor Reisel, William Buckley, James Reston, Max Freedman, and David Lawrence. Four of these (White, Freedman, Carpenter, and Means) are close friends of Lyndon Johnson's. The only nonconservative among the remainder is Reston, and he appeared less frequently than before. Liberal cartoonist Herblock no longer appeared. The paper dropped Ralph McGill and Whitney Young, and conservative columnist David Lawrence was run twice as often as before.

Almost a year after Steven was fired, a series of articles on the Negro community, criticizing among others the slum landlords, had not been published. Reporter Saul Friedman, who has since gone to Detroit, had worked on the series four months. It was ready for publication when Steven was discharged.

On a number of urgent local issues the editorial page went blank. It decided, in an abrupt change, that the televising of school-board sessions was not important. When Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach made a major speech urging the city to complete its racial integration willingly and without rancor, the Chronicle, whose editorials under Steven had not been reticent about giving opinions, merely suggested that readers look at the speech. Another editorial recommended that readers look at a certain column of William White's. An editor told a subordinate, "That will be a signal to President Johnson that we're still with him." The new Chronicle apparently hoped to send esoteric signals to the President that would go undetected by the owners and the readers.

WHEN the Houston Endowment fired Steven, an indignant citizen of Houston wrote to the White House: "The time has come to license newspapers — to assure that they will use their licenses for the benefit of the public and not just for special interests."

Licensing of the press is, of course, unconstitutional and unwise. But newspapers ought to worry about how often the idea appeals to a frustrated public. There is almost nothing a community can do about a local newspaper that fails in its primary duty. Starting a new metropolitan competitor is too much like a man dissatisfied with his automobile trying to start a new General Motors. He might have done it fifty years ago but not today. Nor is there any effective way he can reach owners who choose to remain unresponsive.

The country's newspaper proprietors, the vast majority enjoying a monopoly, preside over an institution that should be the most sensitive detector of change in society. But among major American institutions, newspapers have been the least responsive to upheavals in civilization since World War II. Government, education, religion, and much of corporate life have adapted to altered conditions in economic and social life, but newspaper owners have clung to the past. They seem to be reminded of their special status under the First Amendment only when someone suggests changes in the second-class mailing privilege or the payment of standard wages to delivery boys. Their response to the notion of the press being accountable to the public is to bar reporters from sessions of the American Newspaper Publishers Association. In addition, the dangers of news monopoly are increasing.

The basic answer to this vacating of responsibility is for owners to include in their corporate hierarchy, their directorships, and their wills some meaningful representation in the public interest, quite divorced from simple property interest.

In the absence of that there are methods by which a paper ownership can establish working communications with its own community. The editor, publisher, and owner of one of the best papers in the country, Barry Bingham, of the Louisville Courier-Journal and Times, has proposed local press councils in which community representatives would regularly sit with the paper's hierarchy to adjudicate complaints and public issues. No one has been trampled in the rush to try it.

Because there has been little evidence of publisher interest in creating some method of public accountability for the press, the government may have to step in. The least that can be done is to take away the "they" of ownership of newspapers, the usually faceless controllers of the community's news. The Post Office requires users of the second-class mailing privilege to list each year all parties who own one percent or more of the stock in the publication. But at present, there is no distinction made between a one percent owner and a 99 percent owner. And the listing, usually published in the paper in early October, is meaningless because it lists only the holders of record, often trustees and third parties acting as executors of wills.

Although a few newspapers offer stock publicly, there is no good reason in law or logic why newspapers should not file for public scrutiny, under postal law, the same information the Securities and Exchange Commission requires of 4500 companies who trade their stock in the open market. The SEC requires the filing as a public record of the names of all officers, directors, and holders of 10 percent or more of stock. Each of those persons in turn must file their holdings in any other traded firm in which they are an officer, director, or holder of 10 percent or more of stock. The present postal requirement was passed to prevent the use of government mailing subsidy by parties using the cover of education and news for propaganda or concealed advertising. The present listings do not usually tell the Post Office or the readers who the beneficial owners of newspapers are or what other financial interests they have that might constitute a conflict of interest and a distortion upon the news.

Newspapers have generally supported the idea that policy-making federal officials should disclose their financial holdings and sell those that might conceivably tempt them to influence their work for their own benefit. The American newspaper is almost a branch of public administration. It is the most important single instrument of information in a society peculiarly dependent upon public knowledge and public opinion; for its own future and the national good it needs to be as free as possible, and it needs to assure increasingly dubious readers that it is free.

Negro Woman and Four Whites Vying for Congress in Carolina

NORTH CAROLINA

Special to The New York Times

RALEIGH, N. C. Dec. 4 — Five candidates, including the first Negro to run for Congress in North Carolina since 1901, are seeking the Democratic nomination for the First District House seat left vacant by the death of Representative Herbert C. Bonner.

Mr. Bonner, a Democrat who was chairman of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, died Nov. 7. A special primary to pick the Democratic nominee to succeed him has been scheduled for Dec. 18.

The Republican nominee is Dr. John P. East, 34 years old, a political science professor at East Carolina College in Greenville, who was the only candidate from his party to file for the office.

A Republican party effort to secure an injunction prohibiting the special election until after North Carolina's Congressional districts are realigned met with failure. A panel of three Federal judges ruled earlier this week that the Congressional districts must be reapportioned but declined to interfere with the special election.

Special Session Planned

The First District now embraces 15 counties in the northeastern part of the state.

The judges ruled at the same time that North Carolina's House and Senate must be reapportioned. They gave the state until next Jan. 31 to do this.

Gov. Dan K. Moore has said he will call a special session of the General Assembly in January to take action.

Of the five candidates seeking the Democratic nomination in the First District, State Senator Walter B. Jones, 52, of Pitt County, is regarded as easily the leader although there are prospects that a runoff may be necessary to determine the nominee.

Mr. Jones ran against Congressman Bonner in 1960 and lost by a vote of roughly 27,000 to 19,000.

The Negro candidate is Mrs. Sarah E. Small, 38, of Williamston. She is a housewife and a local civil rights leader. She is president of the Williamston unit of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and an eastern field representative for the Congress of Racial Equality. She is the mother of five children.

Mrs. Small's campaign is being run by Floyd McKissick of Durham, national chairman of CORE, and Golden Frinks of Edenton, eastern field director for the S.C.L.C. Their aim is to secure enough votes to give the Negroes a voice in the second primary if one is needed. There are about 103,000 registered voters in the 15 counties of the First District and about 20,800 of these are Negroes.

There has been no Negro candidate for Congress from this state since George Henry White of Edgecombe County was defeated in 1901.

The other candidates in the First District race are Roger R. Jackson, 37, of Hertford, a former state legislator who resigned as executive director of the Chowanoke Area Development Association to make the race; Dr. O. Woodrow Pittman, 49, of Hertford, an optometrist, and C. Don Langston, 51, of Pitt, a banker. Of these, only Mr. Jackson has had previous experience in political campaigns.

North Carolina Looks At Speaker Ban Again

By RICHARD SPONG
Editorial Research Reports

Washington.

Academic freedom is having a relapse in North Carolina. The speaker ban law repealed by the state legislature last November is, in effect, about to be reinstated by the board of trustees of the University of North Carolina.

The law, rushed through the state legislature in the closing hours of the 1963 session without a record vote, outlawed as speakers on the campus of a state-supported institution known Communists, those who advocate the overthrow of the United States or state constitution, and anyone who had taken the Fifth Amendment in any state or federal proceeding. The legislature in November grudgingly amended the law to allow "infrequent" and "rare" appearances of Communists and extremists on occasions that would "clearly serve the advantage of education."

The way to controversy and collision was opened when a small group of Students for a Democratic Society invited a known Communist theoretician and another leftist to speak on campus barely three months after the law was amended.

EARLY THIS MONTH the executive committee of the board of trustees of the University of North Carolina decided that the speakers should not be allowed to appear, and that the university should have a new set of rules on controversial speakers. The full board is expected to ratify that decision on Monday.

North Carolina is the only state where the legislature completely controls the board of trustees of the state institutions. The 170 members of the legislature nominate candidates and then vote upon them. North Carolina is one of the few states where legislators can elect themselves to the board.

With 102 members, the UNC board of trustees is by far the largest in the country. Gov. Dan K. Moore is one of five governors who are also chairmen of their states' university boards of trustees.

Harry Golden, columnist and best-selling author, in a letter to the liberal student Daily Tar Heel observes: "The Governor and the Board of Trustees do not seem to understand * * * that the reputation of North Carolina as 'the most progressive state in the South' is due entirely to Chapel Hill and the accomplishments of its presidents and faculties across the past 35 years!" Less emotionally, Golden suggests that other scholars, educators, scientists, and poets may feel too uncomfortable to speak on the Chapel Hill campus "knowing that they would not have been invited if Gov. Dan Moore had not first declared them kosher."

Although the invitation of the speakers by a small and unrepresentative student group is generally admitted to be brash, the UNC faculty and student body are pretty well lined up against a ban by trustee rather than legislative fiat. The old question of accreditation raised by the speaker ban law may well be revived. As a further irony, Duke University President Douglas M. Knight has approved the appearance on the nearby campus of the Communist spokesman, Herbert Aptheker.

The Daily News of Greensboro suggests that only by returning authority to the embarrassed university administrators can the university be removed from politics and made "self-respecting and worthy of continued respect beyond our borders."

CURB ON SPEAKERS EASED IN CAROLINA

Campus Heads Get Power to Rule on Communists

By GENE ROBERTS
Special to The New York Times

RALEIGH, N. C., Feb. 28—Administrators of the University of North Carolina regained the power today to allow or reject campus speeches by Communists and other controversial leftists.

By an overwhelming vote, university trustees approved a set of speaker regulations that makes the chancellors of the university's four branches, rather than the trustees themselves, the ultimate arbiter on campus speaking invitations.

The chancellors had not had control over campus speeches since 1963 when the North Carolina Legislature banned Communists and two other categories of leftist speakers from state-supported institutions. Last November, the Legislature repealed the ban but gave regulatory control to the trustees.

Short of Student Demands

In view of persistent controversy over the speaker question, today's action was regarded as a significant victory by the university president, William C. Friday, and his chancellors. But it fell short of what student leaders and the American Association of University Professors had requested.

Both the professors and the students opposed giving anyone —chancellors included — the right to ban speakers.

Under the new regulations, certain types of speakers may only be invited by "recognized" student groups, and these groups must file an application with a joint student-faculty screening committee.

The speakers covered are known Communists persons who advocate the overthrow of the state or Federal constitutions, and persons who have pleaded the Fifth Amendment when questioned about subversive activity.

The screening committee that considers such speakers is to submit its recommendation, under the new procedure to the chancellor.

The screening committee that considers such speakers is to submit its recommendation, under the new procedure to the chancellor.

This procedure could put the four chancellors in the center of controversy. If they fail to approve an application, they risk touching off protest demonstrations or a lawsuit from students who contend that any form of speaker ban is unconstitutional.

If the chancellors allow Communists or other controversial speakers to appear, they will erase much of the student and faculty opposition, but they will almost certainly be criticized sharply by some legislators and by state leaders of the American Legion and other organizations.

Early Test Likely

The test may come this week. Paul Dickson 3d, president of the university student body at Chapel Hill, said today that a new student organization, the Committee for Free Inquiry, would apply "immediately" to invite Herbert Aptheker of New York, a leading theoretician of the Communist Party in the United States, and Frank Wilkinson, chairman of the American Committee to Abolish the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Only three weeks ago, the trustees executive committee canceled student invitations to the two speakers.

In urging the trustees to put the speaker question into the hands of his chancellors, Mr. Friday said:

"We believe that one of the most effective means we have of combating doctrines of suppression and false ideologies is by meeting them squarely in open debate through direct confrontation."

He was supported in speeches by Gov. Dan K. Moore, the university chancellors and several trustees. He was opposed by Thomas J. White, a trustee who is also a state senator from Kingston. Mr. White predicted that the chancellors would approve all speaker applications submitted to them.

"If the trustees wash their hands of this control over speakers, as Pilate washed his hands of the blood of Jesus Christ, there will be no restraint over Communist speakers,' Senator White said.

His was the only audible "no" when the new regulations were put to a voice vote.

The speaker question has been one of the most persistent controversial issues in North Carolina since the ban was voted by the Legislature in 1963.

After the Sotuhern Association of Colleges and Schools Inc., threatened to revoke the accreditation of the university branches and 11 state supporteed colleges, the Legislature revoked the ban and gave the trustees the power to regulate speeches by the three categories of speakers.

There has been no threat of accreditation revocation since then, although the power to regulate speakers remained in the hands of the trustees until today.

Gas, Hoses Halt Negro March

A.S 3/11/66

HERTFORD, N.C. (UPI) — Police and state troopers used tear gas and fire hoses Wednesday night to scatter 200 bottle-throwing Negroes who tried to march downtown without a parade permit.

Three troopers were struck by flying objects and one patrol car was damaged, but apparently no one was seriously hurt.

Police arrested 30 Negroes, who posted $50 bond and were freed, when they started the column up the street in violation of a city ordinance requiring permits for parades. After the arrests, the Negroes started to march again and firemen, who had high pressure hoses already connected to hydrants, sprayed the oncoming crowd.

Bottles and bricks flew from the crowd and riot-helmeted troopers fired two tear gas grenades into the marchers. The Negroes scattered and then attempted to reassemble but troopers with four-foot night sticks quickly dispersed them.

The Negroes were protesting hiring policies in this historic coastal city of 2,011. They had been boycotting merchants in Hertford, in extreme northeastern North Carolina, and Perquimans County for some time.

Demonstration Called Off; Conference Substituted

8/11/66 Salisbury Evening Post

HERTFORD, N. C. (AP)—Negroes took their employment demands to the conference table today after suspending demonstrations in this northeastern North Carolina town.

Negro leaders agreed Thursday night to discuss their complaints with white leaders and called off a scheduled protest march after it had proceeded only one block from the First Baptist Church.

KKK RALLY

Meanwhile, the Ku Klux Klan scheduled a rally tonight near Edenton, 15 miles southwest.

Authorities used tear gas and fire hoses to disperse 200 Negroes parading without a permit Wednesday night and hosed about 150 high school pupils who held a protest march Thursday.

Thirty persons were arrested Wednesday night but were released on $50 bonds each. None was arrested Thursday.

Thursday night, about 40 helmeted state troopers watched about 200 Negroes march a block, kneel and pray, and return to the church. About 100 whites also had gathered but there were no incidents.

David Coltrane, chairman of the North Carolina Good Neighbor Council, and Charles Dunn, administrative assistant to Gov. Dan Moore, talked with Negro leaders for an hour Thursday night.

DEMANDS SOUGHT

Civil rights leaders told the marchers they would try to get "four of five of our 14 demands" for the present.

They are seeking employment of Negroes as policemen, deputy sheriffs and store clerks.

Before the brief march, a two-hour mass meeting was held in the church.

Gov. Moore had urgently requested" the Negroes to postpone the demonstrations and take their differences to the local Good Neighbor Council, established Wednesday in Perquimans County.

"I believe that differences can only be settled around the conference table by responsible citizens and not in the streets," said Moore who dispatched Coltrane and Dunn to Hertford.

The governor's remarks were made in response to a telegram from the Rev. F. H. Legarde, a regional director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. The telegram, which also was sent to President Johnson, said:

"Last (Wednesday) night in the exercise of our constitutional rights more than 200 Negroes marched for freedom, jobs and justice in Hertford, N. C. We were stopped by the local and state police powers. Thirty were arrested, the rest hosed down with water and shot with tear gas. . . .

"We call upon you to help us gain our freedom, by enforcing our rights to peaceful and nonviolent protest as guaranteed under the First Amendment. . ."

Five FBI agents and additional state patrolmen were on duty in Hertford Thursday night.

Cooley Facing A Rough Fight

3/13/66

By RAY JENKINS
Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

RALEIGH, N.C., March 12—Congressman Harold D. Cooley of Nashville, dean of the Tar Heel delegation in Washington, probably will have to fight for his political life this year. ....

NORTH CAROLINA

Indications are that James C. Gardner, a Rocky Mount businessman who is in his early 30s, again will be Cooley's Republican opponent. Two years ago, Cooley defeated Gardner by only 5,083 votes out of 141,857 cast.

Gardner is stepping down as state Republican chairman, but so far has declined to reveal his political plans. He has left little doubt, however, that he will be a GOP candidate.

Professional pollsters, employed by the GOP, scanned Cooley's 4th district and also conducted a statewide poll.

WHILE THE pollsters' findings haven't been made public, the results in the 4th district brought jubilation to Republican ranks, since they indicated Gardner would have an excellent chance of beating Cooley, who has held the seat 32 years.

In the statewide survey, the pollsters found that any Republican opposing Sen. Jordan would have an uphill battle. but they also found that any one of three Republicans —Gardner and Congressman Charles R. Jonas of Lincolnton and James T. Broyhill of Lenoir—would give Jordan a close race.

The statewide poll indicated, too, that President Johnson's popularity has declined in the state. Of the voters asked to choose between LBJ and Republican George Romney of Michigan, 42 per cent said LBJ, 29 per cent Romney and 29 per cent undecided.

AGAINST BARRY Goldwater in 1964, LBJ collected 56 per cent of the vote in North Carolina.

The poll produced interesting findings on the 1963 speaker ban law (the original one, not the amended one now on the books). Legislative defenders of the law always have contended that the sentiment for it in the state is "overwhelming."

The poll showed that only 52 per cent of those questioned, a bare majority, favored the original law; 30 per cent favored its outright repeal, and 18 per cent favored an amendment or were undecided.

Four Democrats Predict Tobacco Tax, Liquor By The Drink

Will Reapportionment Make State More Liberal?

NORTH CAROLINA

GREENSBORO DAILY NEWS 4/30/66

BY JAMES ROSS
Daily News Staff Writer

North Carolina is going to become a more liberal state politically because of reapportionment, four Democratic politicians predicted here Friday.

The four politicians were Sixth District Congressman Horace R. Kornegay, State Sens. Ed Kemp and L. P. McLendon Jr., and Hubert Seymour Jr., a candidate for nomination to the U.S. Senate.

Here are some of the things they foresee as products of the congressional redistricting and legislative reapportionment carried out by the General Assembly last January:

- Larger state appropriations to help meet the needs of urban areas.
- A tax on cigarettes, and other tobacco products.
- The legal sale of liquor by the drink.
- Modification of state laws relating to homosexual offenses.
- A law putting North Carolina on Daylight Saving Time in the summer months.
- Free bus transportation for city children who live one and one-half miles, or more, from the school they attend.
- The involuntary retirement of two or three incumbent congressmen who will find themselves in the same district with another incumbent in 1968.

Kornegay, Kemp, McLendon, and Seymour gave their views in panel discussions at A&T College, where the 31st annual meeting of the Association of Social Science Teachers is in progress. The meeting will continue through today.

KEMP AND McLENDON, discussing legislative reapportionment, agreed that the U.S. Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote decision that brought it on was overdue.

McLENDON

KEMP

"And I think the district court's decision in the Drum case will be highly beneficial for the state as a whole," McLendon said. He was referring to the suit brought by Renn Drum Jr. of Winston-Salem to force reapportionment and redistricting in North Carolina.

"The one-man, one-vote decision was the most significant step in democratic government taken in this century," Kemp said.

The effect of reapportionemnt was to shift the center of political power from the coalition of small eastern and western counties to the Piedmont, Kemp said. He predicted there will be a shift of 20 seats in the 120-member House and five seats in the 50-member Senate in the 1967 General Assembly.

"That is really a gain of 40 House seats and 10 in the Senate, because you're taking them away from the conservative small counties and giving them to the large, urban areas," Kemp said.

Kemp said the "classic example of the abuse of power" on the part of the small county coalition was its refusal to provide bus transportation for city school pupils on the same basis that transportation is provided for students in rural schools.

A WOMAN in the audience asked Kemp how he could justify a state tax on food and no tax on tobacco. Kemp replied that he had never tried to justify it.

"I don't know how soon it will come, but I'd stake my life that North Carolina is going to have a cigarette tax eventually," Kemp said. "If the threat of lung cancer won't stop people from smoking cigarettes, I doubt that a 5-cent tax will."

McLendon said the General Assembly did a responsible job in reapportioning itself, although he said it left Guilford the most under-represented county in the state. Guilford, he said, should have three senators instead of two.

Kemp was critical of the job the General Assembly did in redrawing congressional districts.

"Congressional redistricting was a travesty from start to finish," Kemp said. "They started out on the theory it was the legislature's duty to protect incumbent congressmen. That premise precuided any real redistricting."

KORNEGAY

SEYMOUR

Kornegay, discussing congressional redistricting, at an afternoon panel, agreed that the Geeral Assembly wound up with congressional districts of "strange, even amazing, geographical shape."

Kornegay pointed out that the federal court permitted the redistricting to stand for this year, but ordered the General Assembly to redraw congressional districts in 1967.

"It is my feeling that some radical changes will have to be made in 1967," Kornegay said. "The General Assembly will have to achieve closer equality of population in the congressional districts."

THE COURT was critical also of the new districts because some were not compact and because some counties in some districts were not contiguous.

"That language, 'compactness and contiguity,' had never before been used in a reapportionment decision, so far as I can find out. I think it may be significant," Kornegay said. "The real squealing will come when they try to make the districts compact.

"I see no way to avoid putting two, or perhaps three, incumbends in the same district in 1967."

Seymour said congressional redistricting has caused a good deal of confusion, but predicted that the change will make new ideas more acceptable.

"And this shift of political power to the urban centers will bring a shift to more emphasis on solving the social problems related to urbanism," Seymour said.

THE SHIFT of political power to the Piedmont may not be permanent, Seymour said. He said eastern North Carolina is industrializing rapidly and may before the end of this century have as many inhabitants as the Piedmont.

And now that the Piedmont is gaining the political power it has been asking for, it has the responsibility of sending qualified men to the legislature, Seymour said.

Judge Uncorks the Bottle; Liquor Board Will Appeal

5/1/66

NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

RALEIGH, N. C., April 30—North Carolina's State Board of Alcoholic Beverage Control has decided to appeal the order of a Superior Court judge that uncorked the liquor bottles.

Judge H. L. Riddle, Jr. of Morganton enjoined ABC agents from enforcing a ruling by the state attorney general that liquor may be consumed legally only in the home.

Riddle decreed that legally purchased liquor may be consumed from the "brown bags" in restaurants and in bottle clubs in the 41 (of 100) counties that are wet and in the 38 wet municipalities in otherwise dry counties.

The judge's action created unalloyed joy among the restaurant operators, while dry forces said they hope the State Supreme Court will reverse Riddle.

RIDDLE MADE his order applicable only to Mecklenburg county, where the test case originated, and to the State ABC Board.

The State ABC Board, in turn, instructed ABC officers employed by county and city ABC boards to refrain from arresting public drinkers. In addition, State ABC Director Ray Brady has asked local law enforcement officials to do likewise.

In dry counties and municipalities, citizens will still be liable to arrest for "brown-bagging" and drinking in bottle clubs.

It is expected that the State ABC Board's appeal will be filed in the State Supreme Court in September. A ruling on the appeal isn't likely before October.

One main reason the liquor rhubarb arose was that the state's high court has never been called upon to interpret the liquor laws, admittedly a hodgpodge because legislation legalizing liquor sales was superimposed upon a bone - dry prohibition act adopted in 1923.

BUT THE current legal status of the dispute makes it certain that Tar Heel tipplers will be undisturbed through summer's gin-and-tonic season. Whatever the State Supreme Court's decision, it is unlikely to prevail for more than a few months.

The General Assembly meets in February, and there was a strong movement for the updating of the liquor laws before the present furore developed.

Riddle's order was explicit, and barred liquor only at athletic contests. It said in part:

"THERE IS NO violation of the criminal laws of the State of North Carolina when members of bona fide private clubs maintain on their private premises in individual private lockers small quantities of alcoholic beverages, for the sole use from time to time for such persons on said private premises, so long as such members lawfully acquired the alcoholic beverages, and had sole control over the private lockers and its contents and the said alcoholic beverages were kept for the sole use of the member and not for the sale, exchange, distribution, or division among the members of the club or other persons."

Judge Riddle, an Episcopalian, was appointed a special Superior Court judge by former Gov. Terry Sanford.

Supreme Court's Whims Rule Nation, Senator Asserts Here

The Supreme Court "amends the Constitution under the guise of interpreting it" and can make it conform to the views of a majority of its members, Sen. Samuel J. Ervin, D-N.C. told the Atlanta Bar Association Friday night.

Sen. Sam Ervin

"If judges are to substitute their personal notions for the provisions of the Constitution, we will see an end to a government of laws," he continued.

By DIANE THOMAS

Ervin, son of a lawyer and a former practicing lawyer himself, also attacked the idea that Supreme Court justices can overrule past Supreme Court decisions, saying, "This is the stuff of which judicial oligarchies are made."

Criticism is the American way, Justice Fortas says here. Page 9.

Ervin listed many Supreme Court decisions which he said enncroached upon the constitutional powers of Congress and others which he said invalidated state action and state legislation.

The recent South Carolina vs. Katzenbach decision, in which the Voting Rights Act of 1965 was declared constitutional, was "incompatible with the constitutional doctrines of equality and indestructability of the states," he said. The decision "authorizes due process at its shabbiest."

"Laws are designed to furnish rules of conduct for government and people," he stated. "As a consequence, a law is destitute of value unless it has sufficient stability to afford reliable rules

. . . and unless it can be found with reasonable certainty in established legal precedents."

The Senator asserted that recent Supreme Court decision had cast a cloud over the stability of our laws, and that justices had all too often forgotten established legal precedents.

He concluded by quoting George Washington:

"If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. . . . But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed."

The Atlanta Bar Association's Annual Banquet ended with the announcement of officers for 1966-67. They are: Woodrow Tucker, president; Robert L. Foreman, Jr., 1st vice president and president-elect; W. Stell Huie, 2nd vice president; and William W. Cowan, secretary-treasurer.

Members of the Executive Committee include: Byron Ackeridge, A. Paul Cadenhead, Robert Lyle, Samuel F. Lowe, Jr., M. K. Pentecost Jr., and Ben L. Weinberg Jr.

Prison Director Attacking Problem of 'Sex Predators'

5/8/66

By JAY JENKINS

NORTH CAROLINA

RALEIGH, N. C., May 7—V. Lee Bounds, state prison director in North Carolina, is mounting a "multiple attack" on the problem of homosexual and other sexual assualts on prisoners by fellow inmates.

This problem was described by Bounds as "the greatest evil" in the prison system today.

"The notion that we can't keep peace in our prisons is appealing to me, as is the notion that we cannot protect one inmate from another," he said.

Bounds said the "multiple attack" will include changes in equipment and changed procedures for personnel to keep the "predators" among the criminals from making homosexual assualts on prisoners, particularly the youthful offenders.

HE SAID THE State Prison Department will ask the 1967 General Assembly for a multi-million construction program to provide more single cell facilities, thereby reducing the number of cells occupied by more than one man.

In most of the prisons, common dormitory space is utilized as sleeping quarters for all of the prisoners.

On an experimental basis, Bounds is going ahead with the construction of individual metal cells. They will be installed on a trial basis in the Polk Youth Center for youthful offenders in Raleigh.

"We are also investigating the feasibility of closed-circuit television and other electronic devices to see what we can do to get better surveillance of the inmates," Bounds said.

HE SAID HE is asking commanders of prison units in the field to encourage custodial officers to move inside the dormitory sections where prisoners sleep.

"The whole climate of fear has got to be expiated," he said. "The notion that custodial officers cannot enter the dormitories at night — that it is forbidden territory — is abhorrent to me."

Added Bounds, who for many years was the prisons expert for the Institute of Government in Chapel Hill before Gov. Dan Moore named him to his present position last year: "I am confident that an adequately informed public will not permit these conditions to continue.

"WE WANT more and more people from the free community to become aware of our problems and involved with us in seeking solutions."

The individual cells planned for the Polk Youth Center are not like solitary confinement cells. A steel wire mesh allows plenty of light.

A prisoner will have in this cell his own bunk, table and chair, and a place to store his valuables. He will be able to leave his cell without the help of a guard.

But he will be able to lock himself in the unit so that only a prison guard with a key can get to him. Any other inmate bent on a sexual or homosexual attack who seeks to enter will create noise that, in turn, will alert the guards.

Under the twisted but stern code of the prisoners themselves, occupants of the individual cells might be stigmatized, or even subject to attack during the daylight hours when they mingle with the rest of the prison population. Even if the experiment doesn't achieve all that is desired, it will be, said Bounds, "at least a beginning."

New Chancellor of UNC Faces Legislative Battle

5/15/66

Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

RALEIGH, N. C., May 14—J. Carlyle Sitterson, 55-year-old native of Kinston, is the new chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

UNC trustees, following the recommendation of President William Friday, named Sitterson to succeed Dr. Paul F. Sharp, who quit early this year to become president of Drake University.

Sitterson, a balding fellow who always walks as if he were bending into a slight breeze, stepped up from the position of acting chancellor on the campus that has been his home since he entered UNC as a freshman in 1927.

In 1955, Sitterson was named dean of the College of Arts and

NORTH CAROLINA

Sciences and also dean of the General College. Five years later, he became Kenan professor of history, and in 1965 he was appointed vice chancellor of UNC.

SITTERSON'S bright academic career was embellished, during his tenure as acting chancellor, by an impressive administrative performance in a tough situation several weeks ago.

He was on the hot seat as the final arbiter in a dispute over the proposed appearance on campus in Chapel Hill of Herbert Aptheker, a Communist, who was invited by the students.

Sitterson barred Aptheker. To some extent, he also calmed the students, who now are turning to the courts in an effort to overturn the legislative in-fighting when the General Assembly Convenes next February.

IN ADDITION to carrying UNC's colors in the biennial joust for a larger share of the tax dollar, Sitterson will join President Friday and others in trying to head off a big push by East Carolina College, a state-supported institution in Greenville, to become an independent university.

ECC President Leo Jenkins has been stumping for university status in speeches throughout the state. Such status, he is saying would help rural Eastern Carolina to an economic and a cultural boom, and remedy an acute shortage of professional and technical personnel.

In addition, State Sen. Robert Morgan of Harnett County, the president pro tem of the 1965 State Senate and chairman of ECC's board of trustees, has been leaving political footprints all over Tar Heelia.

RUMORS of advance vote-trading abound. FCC partisans are said to be advising Piedmont legislators they'll support liberalized liquor laws in return for support of university status for East Carolina College.

Gov. Dan Moore, a UNC alumnus, is on record as opposing ECC's ambitions to become an independent university because that would go counter to existing state policy which holds the state support adequately only a single, multi-campus university.

East Carolina has made it clear that it doesn't want to become the fifth campus of UNC (Other campuses: Chapel Hill, Greensboro, Raleigh and Charlotte). And the tempo of the politicking strongly suggests that the Greenville institution's backers feel they must win their goal next year or not at all.

Moore and Scott Courteous But Attitude Stays Wary

5/22/66

NORTH CAROLINA

RALEIGH, N. C., May 21—A former North Carolina Superior Court judge, who has it made, and a dairy farmer, who is on the make, are being publicly polite to each other these days.

But the former judge, Gov. Dan Moore, and the dairyman, Lt. Gov. Robert W. Scott, are garnishing the courtesy with an attitude of wariness.

The reason is that Scott plans to run for governor in 1968, and the Moore administration may be expected to field a candidate in opposition to him.

Relationships between the governor and lieutenant governor vary, of course, according to the personalities and political loyalties of the occupants of those offices.

ONLY ONCE in recent years has there been a sense of real hostility between the two. After he was elected in 1952, the late Gov. William B. Umstead gave his No. 2 man, Lt. Gov. Luther H. Hodges, the cold shoulder.

A quiet, reserved type, Umstead couldn't abide the go-go Hodges, who popped in on various state board meetings to learn about government. Umstead died in November, 1954, as the school desegregation situation was rushing to a climax.

When he moved up, Hodges' homework produced a smooth transition. Umstead's death also focused unaccustomed attention on the office of lieutenant governor, never considered a political steppingstone.

The lieutenant governor presides over the State Senate and is an ex officio member of the State Board of Education. Except for those duties, the office is largely ceremonial.

SCOTT, 37, represents a more liberal faction of the Democratic party than does Moore. The son of the former governor and U.S. senator, Scott vowed to make the lieutenant governorship a "full-time office" when he was elected in 1964.

During his 16 months in office, Scott has made more than 300 speeches, but Gov. Moore hasn't used his ambitious No. 2 man as a stand-in. Recently, Scott expressed the view that his successor should be given additional statutory duties.

Scott also thinks that the $2,100 annual salary (he also gets $3,000 a year for expenses) should be increased. Lieutenant governors, he said, are pressed financially unless they have independent incomes.

GOV. MOORE recently headed a team of state officials that made a week-long tour of the provinces to give local people pep talks about progress. Afterwards, he was asked at a news conference whether he had considered leaving Scott in charge during his absences.

Moore replied that when he's away from Raleigh, he's in constant contact. "We don't lock up the office when I'm out of town," he said.

A reporter persisted with another question: Does Moore think the lieutenant governor is playing an active enough role in government?

With nimble diplomacy, Moore said, "The lieutenant governor has certain duties prescribed by law, and he is carrying out those duties. I think Mr. Scott is doing a good job in performing those duties."

As governor, Moore let it go at that. As a judge, he might have added, "Call your next case."

4 Carolina Rivals Vie for House Seat

Special to The New York Times

RALEIGH, N. C., May 22 — North Carolina Democrats and Republicans will pick nominees next Saturday for the House of Representatives and for one United States Senate seat.

All incumbents are expected to be renominated except Representative Ralph J. Scott, Democrat of the Fifth District, who is retiring for health reasons.

The contest to succeed Mr. Scott has stirred the most interest in what has been a relatively dull campaign.

Four strong candidates are running in the Fifth, including Smith Bagley, 31, of Winston-Salem, wealthy grandson of the late R. J. Reynolds of the tobacco industry. Mr. Bagley, according to expense accounts filed with the Secretary of State's office here, is spending money freely in an effort to win the Democratic nomination and has obtained support of both liberal and conservative elements.

Others running include two members of the State House of Representatives, William Z. Wood, 42, of Winston-Salem, and Nick Galifianakis, 37, of Durham. The other candidate, Harold Thomerson, 51, is Mr. Scott's administrative assistant.

If no candidate wins a majority, a runoff election will be held.

In the Fourth District, Representative Harold D. Cooley, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, is opposed by two candidates. One is Bill Creech, 40, a lawyer who resigned as chief counsel for the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights to run for the House seat. The other is Columbus M. Tart of Raleigh, a school teacher who is politically unknown.

Mr. Creech has enlivened the race by accusing Mr. Cooley of benefiting from what he called a "Dodd-type" testimonial dinner last year. Mr. Creech said the dinner had been staged by sugar lobbyists while a sugar quota bill was pending before Mr. Cooley's committee. Mr. Cooley has scoffed at this and listed the names of many prominent Democrats from the district who participated.

Ralph J. Scott

Mr. Creech has also run advertisements stressing his connection with Senator Sam J. Ervin Jr., Democrat of North Carolina, who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. The ads have been built around a statement made in the Senate two years ago by Senator Ervin praising Mr. Creech for his work as committee counsel.

Mr. Cooley has been campaigning actively and stressing his seniority in Congress and his committee chairmanship.

Six of the other eight incumbents were renominated without opposition. They are Democrats Walter B. Jones in the First District, L. H. Fountain in the Second, Alton Lennon in the Seventh and Basil L. Whitener in the 10th; and Republicans Charles R. Jonas in the Eighth and James T. Broyhill in the Ninth.

In the Eighth District, T. Lamar Caudle of Wadesboro and John Plumides of Charlotte are seeking the Democratic nomination. Mr. Caudle is trying to make a political comeback.

He once headed the Justice Department's tax division and was convicted and sentenced to two years in Federal prison for using his influence to block prosecution of an income tax case.

He was paroled in 1962 after serving six months of the term, and was pardoned by President Johnson in August, 1965.

Democrats David N. Henderson in the Third and Roy A. Taylor in the 11th Districts have opposition that is regarded as minor.

In the Third District, Mr. Henderson is opposed by S. A. Chalk Jr. of Morehead City, James A. Walker and Don Howell. In the 11th District, Mr. Taylor is opposed by Bruce (Bozo) Burleson, a former wrestler.

In the Sixth District, Representative R. Kornegay is opposed by James Keplinger of Greensboro for the Democratic nomination.

Senator B. Everett Jordan is opposed by Hubert Seymour, 41, a lawyer from Greensboro. This campaign has generated little interest and Mr. Jordan is an easy favorite.

The only Republican contests are in the 10th District, where there are three candidates for the Congressional nomination; and in the 11th District, where there are two candidates. The winners of these races will enter the fall campaigns against the Democratic incumbents.

In the 10th District, the three candidates for the Republican nomination are Terry Parker Wallace and Donald W. Wirick, both of Gastonia, and W. Hall Young of Minneapolis.

In the 11th District, the two Republicans are Joe Sam Schenck of Canton and W. Scott Harvey of Asheville.

BEVERLY LAKE'S VOTER BLOC FAILS TO DELIVER DURHAM

6/5/64

NORTH CAROLINA

By RAY JENKINS

Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

RALEIGH, N.C., June 4 — The son of Greek immigrants will square off June 25 with an heir to the Reynolds tobacco fortune in a second primary contest for the Democratic nomination to Congress from the 5th district.

The runoff between Nick Galifianakis, 37-year-old Durham lawyer, and Smith Bagley, 31, of Winston-Salem, promises to be a torrid affair and presently the odds are fairly even. They seek the seat being vacated by retiring Rep. Ralph Scott of Stokes county.

In the first primary, former state legislator Galifianakis posted a lead of nearly 4,000 votes over Bagley, the second high man, by collecting more than 75 per cent of the votes in Durham county. Two other Winston - Salem candidates, William Z. Wood and Harold Thomerson, managed 18,000 votes between them and were eliminated.

These 18,000 votes are up for grabs and the maneuvering to get them began before the ballot tabulations were completed.

IN THREE other congressional campaigns, Democratic incumbents triumphed and only one was breathing heavily afterward: Congressman Harold D. Cooley of the 4th district, dean of the Tar Heel delegation, with 32 years in Washington, who turned back challenger William A. Creech of Raleigh by better than 7,500 votes.

Easy winners were Congressmen David N. Henderson of the 3rd district and Horace Kornegay of the 6th district.

U.S. Sen. B. Everett Jordan of Alamance county swamped his opponent, Hubert Seymour of Greensboro, by a 4-1 margin.

One facet of the Galifianakis - Bagley campaign may have significant implications for the future of North Carolina politics. The Lake People's Association, named for two-time loser, segregationist I. Beverly Lake, in the gubernatorial sweepstakes, gave its first endorsement: to Bagley.

THE IDEA was to cut into Galifianakis' big Durham vote. The Lake people failed to deliver, although Durham was considered Lake country. This lent support to the theory that the association may be washed up as an effective political force.

Formed after Lake lost the governorship for a second time in 1964, the association hoped to provide the swing vote in campaigns large and small. Then Lake was removed from the political arena when Gov. Don Moore appointed him to the State Supreme Court.

The Bagley endorsement was calculated to indicate whether the association could function without the active leadership of its father-figure. The tentative answer is, "No."

FURTHERMORE, Lake's former law partner, Eugene Boyce, ran sixth in a seven-man field for four seats in the N.C. House of Representatives allotted to Wake County.

Another interesting result of the first primary campaigning was the resurgence of the more liberal, Sanford-Bennett wing of the party in State House races. This wing gets its name from former Gov. Terry Sanford and his campaign manager, Bert Bennett of Winston-Salem.

Bennett was without opposition for the Democratic nomination for one of Forsyth County's two seats in the State Senate. Hargrove (Skipper) Bowles, Sanford's chief fund raiser, led the House ticket in populous Guilford. These examples were repeated throughout the state.

Now the intraparty jockeying will begin in preparation for the statewide races in 1968.

Top Moore Aide Criticizes Slow Action Against Klan

By JAY JENKINS
Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

RALEIGH, N.C., June 18—One of Gov. Dan Moore's principal political lieutenants is miffed because the chief executive isn't moving with greater alacrity against the Ku Klux Klan in North Carolina.

Malcolm B. Seawell, former state attorney general, told a meeting of law enforcement officials in Chapel Hill that existing state laws can be used to disperse the klan.

One of those laws prohibits "secret political societies," and was adopted by the 1953 General Assembly shortly after some klan uprisings in southeastern North Carolina.

In the early part of this year, Moore appointed a Committee on Law and Order, one of the primary purposes of which was to keep an eye on the klan. As chairman, Moore named Seawell.

NORTH CAROLINA

SEAWELL'S role as chairman, plus his strenuous campaigning for Moore's election in 1964, has added much interest to the current disagreement.

Several avowed klansmen ran unsuccessfully for public office in the May 28 primaries. Asked at a news conference if this didn't make the klan liable to legal action under the 1953 law, Moore said the klansmen admitted their affiliation with the hooded order.

"There was nothing secret about that," Moore said, adding that individuals, not organized groups, commit crimes.

In his Chapel Hill speech, Seawell said whether the klansmen were known publicly or were unknown had nothing to do with the issue. Seawell said, too, that the klan as an organization was subject to the law.

"We either become servants to the law or slaves to the lawless," Seawell said. In an apparent reference to Moore's favorite piece of real estate, the "middle of the road," Seawell said, "There is no middle ground."

AFTER SEAWELL'S speech Moore was moved to issue a statement reiterating, "I do not believe the klan serves any useful purpose in North Carolina."

Seawell has been urging that the state seek the revocation of the klan's charter to do business as a "fraternal . . . charitable" organization, on grounds its activities have been at variance with its stated purposes.

Balked thus far by the man who issued the charter, and thus can revoke it, Secretary of State Thad Eure, Seawell now has taken the tack that the 1953 law should be employed.

Both Moore and Seawell are former superior court judges. Seawell in 1960 had an unsuccessful run at the governorship. Tempermentally, Seawell is much more aggressive than his former colleague on the bench.

Experience also colors the disagreement between the two men. In the early 1950s, Seawell was right in the middle of the klan resurgence when a number of klansmen were sent to prison. He compiled evidence on the nightriding floggers of that era.

FROM HIS BASE in the mountains, which were free of klan activity, Moore learned little about the KKK. He now regards it more tolerantly than does Seawell.

What disturbs many Tar Heels is the possibility that Moore's stance may lend new encouragement to the klan in North Carolina.

Survey Brings Agitation To Upgrade Negro Schools

7/17/66

RALEIGH, N.C., July 16 — The first full report on North Carolina's state-supported Negro colleges is a new goal of the State Board of Higher Education.

Watts Hill Jr. of Durham, the board chairman, said he has been assured that the State Board of Education will make available all of its data on the subject.

The decision to make the full-scale study followed a survey by Prof. James Wallace of N.C. State University of the scores made by college seniors on the National Teachers Examination.

Wallace's survey showed that the average scores made by students at all white colleges in the state were higher than the averages at any of the Negro colleges.

DUKE UNIVERSITY seniors made the highest average score, followed by seniors at the University of North Carolina. The lowest scoring bracket was populated entirely by seniors from the Negro colleges whose principal business is preparing teachers.

Some six weeks ago, the

NORTH CAROLINA

State Board of Education adopted higher minimum scores prospective teachers must achieve before obtaining their teachers' licenses in the state.

Negro educators blamed the low level of financial support for the poor showing of Negro seniors. Dr. Kenneth Williams, president of Winston-Salem State College, a Negro school, said, "Negro schools have never been supported properly and adequately from the first grade through the colleges . . . I don't see how anyone would be surprised at the results."

WILLIAMS SAID the Negro schools have received only about one-third of the state support accorded white schools. Negro professors holding comparable degrees are paid less than white professors.

The State Board of Education has always kept secret the result of the prospective teachers' scores on the National Teachers Examination. Prof. Wallace was the first man to penetrate the barrier.

Before the "separate but equal" doctrine was ruled invalid by the U.S. Supreme court, North Carolina had a pat answer to questions about how Negroes fared under the old system. It was this:

Negroes have much more modern public schools than the whites, and the average pay of Negro school teachers is higher than that of whites. That's true, so far as it goes.

THE TREND of legal opinions led to a construction boom for Negro schools as the state sought to give substance to the "separate but equal theory" in what was a belated admission that Negro schools weren't equal.

The average pay of Negro teachers is higher than that of whites because Negroes generally have longer tenure in the top job available to members of that race, and because more Negroes hold master's degrees.

The trouble was that a master's degree offered by a Negro school, because of the lack of adequate appropriations, often didn't equal the bachelor's degree offered by a white school. Now that faculties are being integrated, however, holders of "cheap" diplomas will be teaching white children.

5,000 Klansmen Dismayed As Negroes Join Indoor Rally

NORTH CAROLINA AC 8/15/66

RALEIGH, N.C. (UPI) — Five thousand Ku Klux Klansmen turned out for an enormous indoor rally Sunday and, to their noisy dismay, were joined by a small band of Negroes in the balcony.

The disgruntled klansmen roared so loudly when they spotted the Negroes that their Grand Dragon, Robert Jones, had to come out on the stage of Memorial Auditorium and request them to "hold it down."

Not content with integrating one of the biggest Klan rallies seen in the South, the Negroes began shifting around in the balcony, further upsetting the klansmen. Every time the Negroes, accompanied by a few white integrationists, changed seats, the klansmen around them moved.

"Get out of here and go home," bellowed the klansmen.

A force of hundreds of policemer standing by for the rally, instructed to make arrests for any violation, arrested at least four persons in and around the auditorium.

Roscoe Creed, police said, was charged with "insulting, offending, worrying and annoying Robert Richardson by calling him a 'white nigger' in a public place." Richardson is a student at North Carolina State University.

The auditorium would hold only 3,000 of the klansmen and women, and the other 2,000 had to gather in front of the building. A couple of Klan leaders scrambled out of a second story window and stood on a balcony to address those outside.

When the group of Negroes and whites in the balcony began moivng to other seats, a contingent of Klan security guardsmen marched up to the balcony, surrounded the integrationists, and filled up the rest of the seats around them.

Local authorities were apparently determined to avoid anything like a smaller Klan rally here two weeks ago, when the Klan security men allegedly used strong-arm tactics to clear public sidewalks and parks.

Police Chief Tom Davis ordered his men to arrest "anyone and everyone involved in any law violations."

At the state military center on the edge of the city, a 220-man company of National Guardsmen stood ready to foll to the auditorium in eight trucks if needed. Chief Davis ordered his entire 189-man force to work, and more than 100 state patrol cruisers from across the state were parked at patrol headquarters here.

Sanford Stays Uncommitted; Expected to Oppose Ervin

NORTH CAROLINA

RALEIGH, N.C., Aug. 20 — Among the rank-and-file supporters of former Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina, it is taken for granted that in 1968 he will oppose U.S. Sen. Sam Ervin's bid for reelection.

As a shrewd politician, Sanford is aware of the importance of timing and he knows it's too early to show his hand.

To the inevitable question about 1968, Sanford has a stock reply: "I take things as they come."

After U. S. Sen. Willis Robertson and Rep. Howard Smith, two leading old guardsmen, were defeated in Virginia, Sanford told newsmen he thought those results were the continuation of a trend.

As part of the trend, he cited the contest in a sister state, South Carolina, where youthful former Gov. Ernest F. Hollings toppled U.S. Sen. Donald Russell.

SANFORD naturally hopes the trend exhibits staying power. He was 49 this month. Sen. Ervin will be 70 in September.

Time should work to Sanford's advantage in another way. Ervin publicly supported Gov. Dan Moore in 1964, and if the Sanford-Ervin battle materializes in 1968, Moore naturally will be backing Ervin.

But in that year, Moore will be in the final year of his administration, and that is when a governor's popularity traditionally reaches its lowest ebb.

Also, Moore has shown little inclination, to date at least, to try and build a political organization. This has disturbed a number of his closest supporters, who believe Moore's influence will be diluted still more by an apparent indifference about the political tomorrows.

ERVIN HAS proved a potent vote-getter, but he hasn't tried to set up any type of formal organization. Sanford, on the other hand, has kept virtually intact the organization, with emphasis on youth and participation by women, that put him in the governor's office.

Although Sanford was a strong and early supporter of the late President Kennedy in 1960, he hasn't been identified with the Lyndon Johnson forces. Sanford has sharply criticized the jury provisions of the 1966 civil rights act.

Another campaign in 1968 will have an effect on the race for the U. S. Senate. That is the campaign for the governorship. The candidate with the heftiest advantage now is Lt. Gov. Robert W. Scott, 37.

SCOTT AND Sanford may be expected to follow the usual format. Each will proclaim that he is conducting his own campaign, and isn't meddling in any other. Whatever the two candidates say about it, their campaigns will be entwined in the hustings.

Sanford managed the successful senatorial campaign of Scott's father, Kerr Scott, and the nucleus of Sanford's support in 1960 was the bloc of "branchhead boys" who carried Kerr Scott to victory. The magic of the Scott name, imparted to it by Kerr, made Robert the lieutenant governor. In 1968, young Scott may find he needs Sanford's disciplined organizaun as mucn as Sanford needs Scott.

Sanford, meanwhile, is helping his Tar Heel image with his foundation-supported "Study of the American States," designed to strengthen the individual states and increase their influence.

Storm of Criticism Greets Proposal for Cigarette Tax

9/11/66

By JAY JENKINS
Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NORTH CAROLINA

RALEIGH, N.C., Sept. 10—A storm of criticism engulfed a report of the North Carolina Tax Study Commission as soon as its contents were made public by Gov. Dan Moore.

The highlight of the report was a recommendation that the state impose a two cents per package tax on cigarettes to offset a revenue loss that would be caused by giving manufacturers a tax credit on their inventories.

Imposition of the cigarette tax, in the only state that now is without such a tax, would produce $10 million annually. Among the strong voices raised in opposition was that of Lt. Gov. Robert W. Scott.

Gov. Moore studiously avoided endorsing this or any other of the recommendations in the report.

FINANCIAL relief proposed for the cities and counties was put on a do-it-yourself basis as follows:

—Counties would be authorized to levy, on a local option basis, a one per cent local sales tax, the proceeds from which would be divided between the counties and the municipalities.

—Cities would be authorized to tax motor vehicles up to a limit of $10 per vehicle per year. The present limit is $1.

Except for the cigarette tax and the do-it-yourself proposals, the report was largely a reshuffling of existing tax revenues. If adopted, the net gain to the state would be $1.1 million annually.

IN THE unlikely event each of the 100 counties imposed the one per cent sales tax, their collective revenues would rise by $37.1 million yearly.

In the equally unlikely event all of the cities shared in the local sales tax levy, and if all of the cities imposed the maximum tax of $10 per vehicle, collective municipal revenues would increase $24.1 million annually.

Local governments now receive the proceeds from the tax on manufacturers' inventories, a tax the state's industry-hunters say has handicapped them. The report wouldn't interfere with local revenues, but would have the state absorb the loss (to be recouped via cigarette taxes).

Under the recommendation, manufacturers would be allowed to deduct 50 per cent of the inventory tax paid when they pay their corporate income tax.

CITIES AND counties lambasted the proposed local option sales tax, contending the 3 per cent state sales tax should be increased statewide, with the extra one per cent being returned to local governments.

Under local option, one county would be loath to add the tax since a neighboring county might forego it, and thus siphon off trade.

The outlook for adoption of the report by the 1967 General Assembly is dismal. Gov. Dan Moore, in fact, may oppose most of it.

Few believe that the cigarette tax has any chance of survival. If it fails, the rest of the report probably will join it in limbo.

DUKE LAW SCHOOL BREAKS WITH BAR

NORTH CAROLINA

State Lawyer Had Refused to Admit Negro Graduate

12/15/66

Special to The New York Times

DURHAM, N. C., Dec. 14 The Duke University Law School revealed today that it had broken off relations with the North Carolina Bar Association because the association has refused to admit as a member a Duke law graduate, presumably solely because he is a Negr

The Law School said this meant the association would be denied the use of the school's facilities and that the Duke law school no longer would participate in the association's continuing legal education program.

Agrees on Procedure

William F. Womble, president of the association, said he regretted that the action had been taken. He said he was particularly sorry about the La School's decision to leave the education program, because the program is open to all lawyers in the state, whether they are members of the association.

Mr. Womble said he agreed "with the proposition that all applications for membershipi n the North Carolina Bar Association should be considered and voted on without regard to race. However, he said he could not say whether this was the deciding factor in this particular case because association board members passing on applicants for membership were not required to explain their votes. He said the association which eliminated its "white-only" provision at its last annua meeting, has had no Negro members and has none now.

The student in question is Eric Michaux of durham, who was graduated from the Duke Law School in 1966, passed the Bar emamination and was admitted to practice before the North Carolina Bar, the lawyers' professional organization. The North Carolina Bar Association, a different group, sponsors social events in addition to the continuing education program.

Dean F. Hodge O'Neal in announcing that the Law School faculty had adopted a resolution severing relations with the association, said the faculty belived Mr. Michaux's exclusion from membership in the association would be an obstacle to his professional advancement. He added that the school felt it had the same responsibility to Negro students as it had to all other students.

No Inquiries Made

In its resolution, the faculty said the association ha d made no inquiries at the school regarding Mr. Michaux's character or legal qualifications, and "under these circumstances, we can only infer that his application was rejected solely because of his race."

Dean O'Neal said conversations with association representatives had supported such a belief, leading to the decision to sever ties.

DO NOT FORGET THE NEEDIEST!

Needs Outreach Growing Surplus

By JAY JENKINS
Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

RALEIGH, N.C., Sept. 3—North Carolina has entered the current fiscal year with a surplus of $79.6 million.

Although the surplus may reach the $100 million-$150 million range by next June 30, it's unlikely that the cushion will do much to relieve the money problems which will confront the General Assembly in February.

The primary reason is that educational needs are multiplying faster than the surplus dollars. All the while the cost of maintaining other state services at the present level is increasing.

Gov. Dan Moore reported the surplus developed because $31.8 million in appropriated funds were unspent during 1965-66.

THE UNSPENT funds are due largely to vacant positions in state government that remained unfilled.

Not until July 1, 1967, will the true surplus be known for the next biennium. This firm figure will be the crucial one as the General Assembly adopts its two-year budget.

NORTH CAROLINA

Whatever it is, educational requests will far exceed it. The public schools, already beset by a teacher shortage, will be clamoring for higher teacher pay.

In addition, institutions of higher learning report that the need for capital improvements — buildings — is so great as to constitute a crisis. A legislative move to float a capital improvement bond issue is considered certain.

IN RECENT sessions, the General Assembly has tended to provide dormitories on a basis that lets the students pay for them through higher rentals. Educators say that system already is pricing some students out of the market.

Rep. David Britt of Robeson County, unopposed candidate for Speaker of the 1967 House, pinpointed another source from which will come requests for higher appropriations: the state prison system. Britt said "a certain emergency exists" in the system now.

He referred to the prison system's plan to seek three new 500-men prison complexes which will include single cells and other construction features to curb a major problem: homosexual assaults by and on inmates.

As House speaker, Britt will appoint the committees in the lower chamber and thus will be in a powerful position to influence the course of legislation.

HE TOOK note of agitation for an increase in the state's legal interest rate of 6 per cent. Britt isn't sold on the idea. "South Carolina has a seven per cent rate, and money is hard to get there," he said. "Even in California, which doesn't have a limit, the story is the same—they're sweating just like we are."

While money, as usual, will be one of the thorniest of legislative problems, it won't monopolize the session starting early in February. The Assembly, for example, is under a federal court order to redraw the congressional district lines again.

Education Forces Launch Drive for Fund Increase

By JAY JENKINS
Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer

NORTH CAROLINA

RALEIGH, N. C., April 2—North Carolina's organized public educational forces are launching their biennial campaign for increased legislative appropriations for the schools.

Gov. Dan Moore is taking a wait-and-see attitude. The state's fiscal condition at the time the 1967 General Assembly convenes in February will influence his stance.

The United Forces for Education (UFE), composed of educational and allied agencies, has outlined a legislative program that calls for a hike of between $135 million and $140 million in the 1967-69 biennium over the spending level for the current biennium.

The UFE sketched its program before it had compiled exact percentages of increase for such items as teacher pay. I did so because timing is a factor.

CANDIDATES FOR the General Assembly meet in the May primaries, and the UFE wanted to outline its goals so the office seekers may be forced to take a stand on them.

The school package was sugar-coated by the assertion that the UFE spending proposals can be financed without any tax increase. Normal economic growth, the UFE asserted, will pay the bill.

While the UFE focuses its concern on the secondary schools, it served notice that it also will support a capital improvements bond issue for the state-supported institutions of higher learning.

The sum of $100 million has been most frequently mentioned in the growing talk about a bond issue. In 1961, under former Gov. Terry Sanford, a $61-million-dollar bond issue that contained $34 million for the colleges, was defeated, largely because earlier in that year Sanford extended the sales tax to food.

MAKING IT PLAIN that he is keeping an open mind on the bond issue, Gov. Moore cited some statistics he said often have been overlooked. The 1965 General Assembly, he said, appropriated $36 million for capital improvements. This total was swelled to $132 million by federal grants and foundation gifts, he added.

But only 4 per cent of the $132-million construction program has been completed, Moore said. "So we have a sizable construction program in being now."

In support of its ambitions for the public schools in the next biennium, the UFE said that North Carolina is losing rank in per-pupil expenditures and in teacher pay.

IT IS PROPOSED that the teacher salary schedule be increased from the present $4,234-$5,856 range to $5,000-$8,500, at an estimated cost during the biennium of $90 to $95 million.

The UFE also asked $11.2 million to extend the terms of teachers by three days, with corresponding term extensions for principals and supervisors. If this is approved, 116 union school principals and 77 senior high principals would be employed on a 12-month basis.

Another proposal would reduce class size in the first three grades from one teacher to 27 pupils to 1-26, and in the elementary and high school grades from 1-30 to 1-29.

Still another item in the package calls for state-supported, pilot kindergarten projects. Another would give city pupils school bus transportation under the same conditions it's afforded to rural children.

POVERTY PROGRAM IS G.O.P.'S TARGET

~~PRO CONGRESS~~

Dirksen and Ford Charge Fraud and Ask Inquiry

3/4/66

WASHINGTON, March 3 (AP) — Republican Congressional leaders said today the Administration's antipoverty program had been marked by politics, fraud, waste and other abuses and called for a special investigation.

Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois and Representative Gerald R. Ford of Michigan said they would introduce legislation to create an investigating committee of six Senators an dsix House members drawn in equal numbers from both parties.

"A thorough, honest investigation of the Johnson-Humphrey Administration's handling of the antipoverty war is long overdue," said Mr. Ford, the House minority leader.

Jim Kelleher, deputy director of public affairs of Office of Economic Opportunity, replied:

"I think one of the great successes of this program is that the Republicans have discovered the poor. Up to now everything they have found has come from old newspaper clippings and involved incidents we uncovered, investigated and corrected."

Dirksen Cites Cost

Mr. Dirksen, the Senate minority leader, said that $2.3-billion would have been spent on the program by July 1 and the Administration was asking for $1.7 billion more for the next fiscal year.

"For these vast sums the American people and the poor have gotten a very shabby product," he said.

The two leaders read their statements, approved in advance by the Senate-House Republican Leadership Conference, at a news conference.

Mr. Dirksen said the antipoverty program had been marked "by political favoritism and too often has become the tool of political machines."

He also said there has been "political infighting" by local Democratic politicians for control of community action program funds.

"They want the money to build political machines, not to reclaim and dignify human lives," he said.

Mr. Dirksen also said that "mass creation of extravagant Job Corp centers, a lack of discipline and purpose have resulted in disillusionment, rioting and vicious gang rule."

He said the Job Corps budget last year had averaged $7,800 for each enrollee, "almost twice the cost of sending a boy to college."

Lawyers for Poor Call on Shriver To Set Aside a Special Aid Fund

3/4/66 QE.O.

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 3 — Lawyers who advise Sargent Shriver on the legal services program of the antipoverty campaign demanded today a $50-million fund plainly marked for that work so, they said, they would not have to kowtow to community action agencies.

The National Advisory Committee of the Office of Economic Opportunity adopted a resolution to that effect after members from all over the country, had complained about delays in financing proposals.

Some of the lawyers thought the regional offices of the office of Economic Opportunity, the Federal Poverty agency, were responsible for the delays. A majority, however, seemed to agree with E. Clinton Bamberger Jr., the director of the legal services program, that the local agencies, made up of local people, were dawdling because they preferred to spend antipoverty money on other types of programs.

Some Funds Exempted

Currently, $20-million is marked for the legal services program. Half of that comes out of discretionary funds of Mr. Shriver, director of the poverty agency. Grants made out of such funds are not charged to a state or community's general allocation.

Mr. Bamberger said that the quality of some proposals for legal aid programs had not been good and that that had led to delays.

"A community action agency isn't going to work very hard for a legal services program when there is something else they want to do," he said.

Prof. Soia Mentschikoff of the University of Chicago's Law School said that a legal services proposal presented to the Chicago community action agency eight months ago was still lying there. She said that other proposals carrying political overtones caused controversy and held up everything, including legal services for the poor.

Procedure Stipulated

Under present rules, a legal services proposal has to go through a community action agency or its proponents have to make out a convincing case for by-passing.

The resolution for $50-million in discretionary funds for the coming fiscal year was offered by Theodore Voorhees, president of the National Legal Aid and Defender Association.

Edward Q. Carr, director of the New York Legal Aid Society said he would make every community action agency show why it did not need a legal services program. The knowledge that the anti-poverty program exists is dampening other legal aid programs, he said. Municipal officials, for example, tell petitioners to take their problems to Washington.

"This committee, and you, Mr. Bamberger, got to generate a hell of a lot of heat behind this program," said Mr. Carr.

Vote for Policy Board Small Despite Big U.S. Drive

3/4/66

By GLADWIN HILL

Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, March 3—One of the largest antipoverty programs in the nation is smarting from a tacit rebuff by the people it was designed to help.

A final check of ballots indicated today that less then 1 per cent of 400,000 eligible "poor" turned out to vote last Tuesday for representatives in the administration of the program.

Although a similar lack of interest had been displayed in poverty-program elections in other cities, officials of the Office of Economic Opportunity had hoped for better results here, particularly because of the program's link with the Watts riot of last August.

The Federal Government appropriated $61,000 to stage the election of seven persons to the 23-member policy board of the county's Economic and Youth Opportunities Agency. The agency's program for the year ending in July totaled $41-million, 40 per cent of it allocated to the riot area.

A corps of 600 volunteers was organized to familiarize people with the election. The balloting, originally set for Feb. 8, was postponed three weeks for additional promotion time. On election day, 25 chartered buses helped get people to 154 polling places.

The familiarization campaign included the distribution of 100,000 newspaper-size leaflets in Spanish and, in the suburb of Pasadena alone in the preelection week, 25,000 pieces of literature.

Only 2,659 people voted to select seven representatives from among 54 candidates. The winners comprised Mexican-Americans and three Negroes. Poverty program beneficiaries divide about evenly between these two ethnic groups.

The votes cost the Government more than $22 each.

The turnout of less than 1 per cent compared with 2.4 per cent in a recent election in Philadelphia, and 6 per cent in Hartford. A program official termed the result "not a setback but a disappointment."

A Few Factors

Officials cited the following presumed factors in the small turnout:

¶While other cities defined one poverty area and allowed all residents to vote, Los Angeles, with a dozen concentrations of poverty scattered over the 5,000-square-mile county, limited the voting to persons with annual incomes of less than $4,000 and to heads of households over 18 years old and single persons over 21.

"That income stipulation may have been a psychological mistake," a program aide conceded. "People were reluctant to classify themselves that way, even though they welcome assisitance. It would probably be the same if you held an election in a middle-class area and set a borderline at $10,000 or $15,000. Many people would balk at identifying themselves in any particular bracket."

¶A view by "the poor" that because they were allocated less than a third of the board votes, their opinions wouldn't get much hearing.

¶A belief that one candidate was as good as another.

¶A traditional apathy about elections as a middle-class institution.

The election was inadvertently scheduled on the day that county welfare checks were due.

Mayor Samuel W. Yorty, who has contended that the poor should hold majority representation on neighborhood project-development boards rather than minority representation on the countywide board, called the election a "costly farce."

Job Corps' Costs in '65 Doubled Early Estimates

Outlays for Enrollee Totaled $11,251, Instead of $6,000

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 10—The Job Corps component of the antipoverty program last year cost nearly twice as much as the estimates given to Congress six months ago.

Representative Edith Green, Democrat of Oregon, brought out the new data at a House Education and Labor Committee hearing today, implying as she did so that the Office of Economic Opportunity had given her misleading figures as recently as a week ago.

Officials of the antipoverty agency, said, however, that current costs of the Job Corps centers had been reduced far below those of 1965. For all centers, the annual cost in 1965, the first year of operation, was $11,251 for each enrollee. For men's urban centers the cost was still higher.

Last September, in testimony before the House Appropriations Committee, Sargent Shriver, director of the office of Economic Opportunity, estimated the cost at $6,000.

Optimism Voiced

Wray Smith, Director of Urban Centers, said he was certain that cost would be brought down to $6,600.

The figures include capital outlays, such as construction or rehabilitation of dormitories. These costs are spread over 15 to 18 years for bookkeeping purposes.

Last fall, Mr. Shriver put the amortization period at 10 years for construction and five years for equipment. The longer the spread of amortization the lower the annual costs look.

The New York Times
Representative Edith Green

Mrs. Green asked Mr. Smith if about a week ago he had given her on the telephone a figure of $640 a man a month as the all-inclusive cost of men's urban centers. Mr. Smith agreed that he had.

The Oregon Democrat then asked in a stringent tones if that figure had omitted three cost items as well as capital outlays. Mr. Smith affirmed her statement and added, "I misspoke myself."

Mrs. Green added the missing items and arrived at a total of $9,120, which is roughly midway between last year's costs and pro rata estimates for a six-months' period ending next June 30.

Comparison of Costs

Mrs. Green then compared these costs with the $484 that she said was the national average expenditure per pupil in the elementary and secondary schools of the county.

Shrive Projections Queried by Rep. Green at Hearing

She asked whether the Job Corps costs for 20,000 young persons could be justified, or whether the Government should turn to alternatives.

Mr. Shriver said he might agree if the Job Corps were the only antipoverty program, but there are others, such as the Neighborhood Youth Corps, he said.

Mr. Shiver's experience today differed from the bouquet atmosphere he enjoyed on his first day of testimony last Tuesday, although his majority support of the committee was not seriously threatened.

Representative Augustus F. Hawkins, Democrat of California, criticized Mr. Shriver's statement on Tuesday that he was considering cutting off funds for election of representatives of the poor to community action agencies.

Mr. Hawkins asserted that the O.E.O. had accepted "stupid" ground rules for the Los Angeles election on March 1. The poor in Los Angeles, said Mr. Hawkins, believe the O.E.O. is not on their side.

G.E. to Run Women's Center

WASHINGTON, March 10 (AP)—An agreement has been reached with the General Electric Company for operation of a Job Corps Center for Women in Clinton, Iowa, the Office of Economic Opportunity announced today.

The antipoverty agency also said General Precision Equipment, Inc., would be the new contractor for operation of the Breckinridge Job Corps Center at Morganfield, Ky.

KANSAS CITY POOR BAR POVERTY PLAN

Elected Delegates Say U.S. Proposals Will Not Help

By DONALD JANSON
Special to The New York Times

KANSAS CITY, Mo., March 12—Kansas City's poor, given a greater voice in the antipoverty program, expressed wide-ranging reservations this week about Federal help planned for them.

A council elected from the heart of the Negro slum section rejected all 13 community-action proposals presented Wednesday at a board meeting of the Human Resources Corporation. Councils from the eight other poverty areas supported the proposals only in part.

The corporation is an agency established last year to guide the Federal antipoverty program here. So far it has failed to get the program off the ground; it has not even accepted the more than $2-million offered by the Office of Economic Opportunity as a starter.

In December the board dissolved itself following charges by the poor that they lacked an effective voice in planning and authorizing projects. Last month elections in four areas increased representation of the poor on the board.

Proposals Brought Back

This week 13 proposals tabled in last year's impasse were resurrected.

Miss Loretta Johnson, elected representative of the central city povery area told the board that her 11-man council liked none of the projects.

"We feel that these programs won't really help the poor," she said.

She also attacked a plan to staff the programs with professionals.

"We feel you could take these salaries and divide them five or six times and get nonprofessionals to do the same job," she said.

Mrs. Leona P. Thurman, who practices law in the slum area, said the poor feared the funds would never filter down to them.

Chester E. Stovall, executive director of the corporation, said in an interview later in the week that most staffing for the projects would be from the ranks of the poor but that the programs proposed would have to be headed by trained lawyers, social workers, teachers and home economists.

'Upward Bound' Goes Down

The programs would provide legal aid, catch-up education, child care, and job and home-making training. An "upward bound" program would pay the cost of summer classes at the University of Missouri and Rockhurst College to help high school juniors and seniors from culturally deprived neighborhoods qualify for college scholarships.

Miss Johnson was particularly critical of "upward bound."

"We don't want any part of it," she said.

She said parents in her area did not want to expose their children to advantages they might never be able to afford.

"We don't want to give children this little taste of honey," she asserted, "only to have it taken away when the summer's over."

Finds No Precedent

Board officials were nonplussed.

Mayor Ilus W. Davis, president, warned that opposition meant missing a golden opportunity to acquire Federal financing.

"Never before," he said, "have 28 people sat down at a table in this city with $2-million handed to them on a platter to help the poor."

Nine of the 28 now are representatives of the poor themselves.

A corporation spokesman noted later than one of the nine, Miss Johnson, represents an area where Saul D. Alinsky is beginning a separate effort to organize the poor to better their lot.

Mr. Alinsky is head of the Industrail Areas Foundation, which has organized slum neighborhoods into political forces in several cities. He began a 30-month Kansas City Project last week. Here as elsewhere he has attacked the Federal antipoverty program as ineffective.

The Human Resources Corporation board will meet again March 23 to hear written reports from each poverty area council and vote on the 13 proposals. Mr. Stovall predicted their acceptance despite this week's adverse reaction.

Norwalk College to Open Stratford Branch in Fall

Special to The New York Times

NORWALK, Conn., March 12—A branch of the Norwalk Community College will be opened this fall in Stratford as a result of a two-year campaign by a committee of 80 Stratford citizens.

The State Board of Education approved the Stratford project and a projected branch of the state community college system in Middletown at a meeting last week. Norwalk Community College became part of the state system on Friday.

The Stratford college will at first use a Stratford school building, with classes being held from 3:30 P.M. to 10 P.M. Plans will be made to open this coming September with 150 full-time students and at least that many studying part time. The new unit will offer a complete curriculum.

POVERTY PROGRAM PLANS NEW GOALS

Agency Expected to Stress Job Finding in Its 3d Year

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 14 — Hearings being held now on the anti-poverty program's needs for its third-year indicate which experiments look shaky and the changes that may be made. The House hearings resume tomorrow.

When the Government started the program of 10 components in 1964, the designers agreed that it was largely experimental and subject to reshaping as experience indicated.

Looking shakiest is the experiment of "maximum feasible participation" of the poor in designing projects in their communities.

Next, there is the prospect that the thrust of the campaign against poverty will be redirected from a self-help experiment to a public employment program if Representative Adam Clayton Powell successfully insists that the Government hire everyone it trains, if private industry does not.

Third, the fate of the Job Corps is uncertain because of unexpectedly high costs.

Innovation The Keynote

A virtue of the campaign against poverty, it was said at the start, was to be innovation. The campaign was not intended to provide instant relief. It was intended to show the poor how to avoid the relief rolls and to leave their children something better than a legacy of poverty.

"Maximum feasible participation" of the poor was to be one innovation on this point, Sargent Shriver, the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, told congress last spring:

"The experts said the poor are apathetic, inarticulate, incapable of formulating demands, designing programs, assisting and diagnosing their own needs. They were wrong. The poor are only waiting for the opportunity to be heard on a subject only they understand."

In the year since then only about 12 cities have used the available open election process to choose representatives of the poor. Most mayors resisted the organizing of the poor, which such elections imply, because they saw it as a threat to their power. They brought pressure in Washington.

Last November there were reports that the Budget Bureau, a powerful arm of the White House, had told Mr. Shriver's agency to de-emphasize participation of the poor in policy matters and to emphasize jobs. Mr. Shriver's response sounded like a denial but actually was not.

No matter, the de-emphasis on participation started almost immediately. The Office of Economic Opportunity never put into writing any suggested figures on "maximum feasible participation." However, it had been saying orally that it expected representatives of the poor would comprise at least one-third of each community action board.

When cities such as Atlanta admitted far less than a third of its board, Mr. Shriver said that the process of participation was "evolutionary." His agency's oral interpretation of participation then dropped to 25 per cent. Then it approved a Cleveland election that gave the poor 20 per cent of the places on the board.

Last week Mr. Shriver said he was disposed to cut off funds for elections because the turnout had been small. But he noted that only 3 per cent of the eligible persons turned out in New Jersey to elect delegates to a constitutional convention.

Unless outside organizations such as the Citizens Crusade Against Poverty can provide the necessary contervailing force, the election procedure may disappear from the anti-poverty 2program. The mayors then will be free to adopt controls, such as those in Chicago, where an upside down system permitted the director of a neighborhood center, a paid employe, to discharge a member of the center's advisory council.

On the problem of jobs, Mr. Shriver said he expected to channel 46 per cent of his new budget into jobs or training for the poor. That would be an increase over current programing. Mr. Powell, a Democrat of Manhattan, who is chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, said the figure would have to be 60 per cent.

Last week a House hearing was told that the residential training centers for the Job Corps last year cost more than $11,000 for each enrollee, compared with $484 for each student in the nation's public schools. This prompted Representative Edith Green, Democrat of Oregon, to suggest that Mr. Shriver's agency start looking around for alternatives to the Job Corps.

OEO Names Coordinator To Erase Bias

OEO

The Office of Economic Opportunity Saturday announced the appointment of a former Florida NAACP official as a regional coordinator in Atlanta to assure nondiscrimination in the war on poverty.

Robert W. Sanders will supervise compliance with OEO nondiscrimination regulations for the organization's Southeastern office.

The office here has responsibility for Georgia, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, South Carolina and Florida.

Mr. Saunders is a former field representative for the NAACP in Florida and was a reporter for the Cleveland Call & Post newspaper.

He was one of seven regional coordinators appointed, according to the announcement from Washington.

THE COORDINATORS will be "objective fact finders" to help insure compliance with OEO's nondiscrimination regulations in employment and services for poverty war agencies and their service contractors, the OEO said.

Other coordinators and their new offices are: Mrs. Charlotte Lewis, San Francisco; Franklin D. Ducheneaux, Kansas City, Mo.; Gregorio E. Coronade, Austin, Tex.; Georgie E. Pitts, Chicago; Vance E. Clark, Washington, D.C., and Steve W. Duncan, New York.

Also named was a contract compliance officer to serve at OEO headquarters and to assure that "all OEO contractors are nondiscriminatory in their employment and services."

The compliance officer is Ruby Burrows, a Howard University law graduate and former aide to Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

ISSUES RULING
Sargent Shriver

U.S. Opens Poverty Unit Books

AC 3/24/66 OAZO

By NAN ROBERTSON

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON, — Local poverty agencies across the nation were ordered Wednesday to open all their books upon demand for public inspection.

The sweeping directive from Washington includes all financial records, applications for federal money, minutes of public meetings and complete details of signed contracts.

The ruling signed by Sargent Shriver, director of the anti-poverty campaign, also states that community action agencies in about 700 cities must make available upon request that the names, job descriptions and salaries of all local poverty program employes.

PUBLIC HEARING

The directive further rules that any anti-poverty agency with a federal grant shall hold public hearings no later than 30 days after "any person or group" in the community asks for such a meeting. The request may be denied only if three-quarters of the local governing board present vote that it is "frivolous" or "repetitive."

In addition to public hearings, open hearings shall be mandatory from April 15 on for any new applicants for federal support.

Shriver's instructions, made public while he is on a holiday in Kenya, go far beyond an amendment written into the Economic Opportunity Act last year by Sen. Jacob K. Javits, R-N.Y.

PUBLIC ACCESS

That amendment included provisions for "reasonable public access" to local poverty records and books and "reasonable opportunity for public hearings at the request of appropriate local community groups."

There were indications last November that Washington might take this step. At that time Javits wrote Shriver, saying that this "might well slow down unduly the rate of applications" and was "not the intent of the Congress."

Shriver replied Dec. 15 that he shared Javits' "resistance to any procedure which would unduly slow down the process of getting a program underway."

The fear is that anti-poverty boards will be exposed to considerable public harassment by opponents of poverty programs.

POWELL ASKS RISE IN POVERTY FUNDS

Cites 'Uncountable Billions' Being Spent in Vietnam

By NAN ROBERTSON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 30—Representative Adam Clayton Powell announced today he would ask Congress for $7-billion for next year's poverty program instead of the "timid," "wrist-tapping" sum of $1.75-billion sought by the Johnson Administration.

The Manhattan Democrat said that while the United States "spends uncountable billions of dollars to pursue a victory-less war" in Vietnam, "we are shortchanging our own citizens with a heartless stinginess."

Mr. Powell is chairman of the Education and Labor committee, which has jurisdiction over the program, said that at present it was "too small, with too few dollars to help so many."

Mr. Powell offered his own 10-point plan that he said he considered "the irreducible minimum" for an "effective crusade against poverty."

Instead of a bold assault on the problem, he said, "we are wrist-tapping this scourge with a timid, fragmented skirmish."

His first point was an amendment to raise the poverty budget to four times what President Johnson has asked.

"In 1967, we shall spend $4.4 billion in economic assistance to foreign countries," he said. "I submit we can and should and must spend that much and more for Americans."

"To prevent local officials from emasculating the anti-poverty programs to preserve their selfish political interests I shall offer an amendment that unequivocably bars any use of the veto over any community action program by any mayor, city council or local governing body.

"Mayor cannot veto Social Security, mayors cannot veto Medicare, mayors cannot veto unemployment compensation.

"I intend to see that they cannot veto programs of 90 per cent Federal funds when their cities only supply 10 per cent matching funds."

Mr. Powell said he would offer "with particular pleasure" an amendment that completely abrogates the right of the Office of Economic Opportunity, which is headed by Sargent Shriver, to "prescribe any kind of loyalty or security test based upon any set of spuriously collected files."

His reference to vetoes referred to widespread charges that Mayors and other top city officials are fighting to gain control of poverty money and projects to increase their own political power.

Program officials reply that a veto is "automatic," since a local poverty program cannot get under way unless the community furnishes 10 per cent of the money.

The New York Times

SEEKS MORE FUNDS: Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Manhattan Democrat, said he will ask for $7-billion next year in antipoverty appropriations.

Mr. Powell said he had told Mr. Shriver in a long conversation this morning that he was "unalterably opposed" to a Mayor's veto, automatic or not, and that he would propose full Federal funding of local community action programs.

The second Powell amendment refers to new morality requirements and harsher loyalty standards issued this month for tens of thousands of persons who will be hired in all future local poverty projects.

Mr. Shriver said today, however, that such instructions from his office are "not cast in concrete" and could be changed.

Mr. Powell indicated that his committee would support him on the loyalty-security issue, and noted that "we got rid" of a similar clause in the Higher Education Act.

He also proposed that funds for community action projects be doubled. The Administration is now asking $914-million for these projects.

Mr. Powell said that the $7-billion figure was based on estimates from his staff and some of the nation's "best economic experts," including Leon Keyserling, Michael Harrington and Saul Alinsky. Mr. Alinsky is a sociologist.

Mr. Powell made his 10-point program public today in a news conference called in the hearing room of the House Education and Labor Committee, which he heads.

In answer to a question, Mr. Powell predicted violence again this summer in the Watts District of Los Angeles, "in Brooklyn more than Harlem" and "Newark, the worst."

Official Fired By Poverty Unit

Atlanta's antipoverty agency has fired the director of its Neighborhood Youth Corps for out-of-school youngsters after an investigation and charges of "incompetence."

Economic Opportunity Atlanta, Inc. (EOA), announced Saturday, in a statement released by Administrator Charles O. Emmerich, that NYC Director Irving C. Gordon was dismissed Friday from his $10,350 job.

The action followed "a week-long evaluation" by two top EOA officials who recommended "that Mr. Gordon be terminated for incompetence," the EOA statement said.

The NYC program to provide part-time employment and job training for out-of-school youths from 16 to 21 "has suffered for some time," the statement added.

A TOTAL OF 873 job openings were available under the program kicked-off in Atlanta last August, but the number of youths employed as of March 31 was only 605, an EOA spokesman said Saturday.

The evaluation of Mr. Gordon came after seven of nine professional staff members working for him signed a protest petition.

The petition asserted that Mr. Gordon, one of several top Negro officials employed by EOA, "was unable to gain the confidence of his professional staff and to direct the program," said William Terry, personnel officer for the poverty agency.

The NYC director was given an opportunity to resign his post, but declined to do so, Mr. Terry said.

Mr. Gordon was not immediately available for comment. But an EOA official said Saturday, "I have been told he plans to appeal his discharge, and I'm sure he will."

THE EVALUATION of Mr. Gordon was made by Mr. Terry and Dr. Tillman Cothran, deputy EOA administrator for programs. Dr. Cothran is the highest ranking Negro employed by EOA.

Both officials recommended to David R. Beecher, EOA associate for operations, that the NYC director be discharged, the EOA statement said.

"Mr. Gordon has been unable to reach many underprivileged youths who could have profited by the NYC jobs and training opportunity," Mr. Terry and Mr. Cothran were quoted as saying in the EOA release. "The majority of Mr. Gordon's top staff has registered a protest against his administration of the program."

MR. BEECHER has asked John H. Calhoun, an official of the EOA neighborhood services organization, to temporarily take over the NYC post. Mr. Calhoun is a Negro and has been well known in Atlanta political circles for years.

There has been internal friction in the NYC out-of-school program ever since it began eight months ago, reliable sources report.

The program was budgeted approximately $1 million for its first six-months operation and spent considerably less than that.

"We are going to lose some money, I'm afraid, if we don't fill those spots," Mr. Terry said.

The U.S. Department of Labor allocates funds for the out-of-school program, he pointed out, and "probably will direct a reduction in the number of remaining job opportunities here if we do not fill all these jobs."

THE EOA BOARD of directors on Sept. 15, 1965, voted to request 690 more NYC jobs for Atlanta. This would boost the total of jobs available to 1,563.

Underprivileged youths from poor families can make a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour for up to 25 hours a week under the program.

Many of the jobs initially opened were with the city sanitation department and have been hard to fill. EOA officials say some of the job openings have been reshuffled to make them more attractive.

House Labor Panel Majority Maps Cut in Funds for Community Action

4/28/66

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Leading House Democrats have agreed on amendments that will alter the face and character of the Great Society's campaign against poverty.

They are the majority of the Education and Labor Committee. They have been meeting secretly and will be ready in a few days to confront the Republicans with a Democratic consensus.

The changes are aimed straight at the Community Action Program, which Sargent Shriver last month called "the prime offensive weapon in the war on poverty."

It is one of eight major programs superintended by Mr. Shriver's Office of Economic Opportunity. Politically it is by far the most explosive program because it is the only one that requires "maximum feasible participation" by representatives of poverty areas in the selection and design of local projects.

The issue of policy participation by the poor has generated "ugly problems of the political establishment," in the private language of one House Democrat who is supporting the changes.

"Extremist groups have seized it as a forum for dissent," he said.

Less than $600-Million

So, while the total war on poverty funds is expected to equal, or exceed, the requested $1.75-billion, the unrestricted funds for community action probably will fall below half the requested amount of $600-million, exclusive of Project Headstart.

In addition, there will be a ceiling of $12,500 on salaries paid with Federal funds, if these views prevail. That limitation would not apply to the antipoverty program generally, but only to community action officials in the field.

State and local governments could supplement these salaries as they wished, but the general expectation ist hat few local agencies would do that and an exodus of talen would follow.

A year hence, local governments would have to put up 20 per cent of the cost of community action programs, instead

DeKalb Approves Poverty War Fund

AC 6/25/66

The DeKalb County Commission voted Tuesday to appropriate $14,898 to support the war on poverty.

The sum, which represents the county government's commitment to the anti-poverty program in DeKalb, will be used to rent office space, pay telephone bills and provide group insurance for the administrative staff in the program.

It was authorized just as federal officials in Washington were reportedly getting ready to act on DeKalb's application for $151,198 in government funds to start a four-part anti-poverty program.

The DeKalb Economic Opportunity, Inc., requested the funds last March to provide a neighborhood help center in Stone Mountain, a county-wide adult education program, a Head-Start program in Decatur, and a four-man central administrative staff.

Officials expect approval of the application within the next few days.

In other action, the commission:

1. Set license fees at $5,000 plus 4 per cent of gross receipts to permit several private corporations to set up community antenna (CATV) television systems in DeKalb.

2. Authorized an agreement to accept $53,401 in state funds to pave a .832-mile-long, 60-foot-wide road leading to an industrial park in the Miller Road to Panola-Stone Mountain Road area.

3. Approved contracts submitted by the Department of Housing and Urban Development to provide a grant to develop open-space land at the old Decatur Water Works property.

The site will be used partially for several baseball and football fields and 20 tennis courts.

DeKalb EOA Will Receive $155,294 in Federal Funds

OEO

AC 5/26/66

By ART PINE

DeKalb County's Economic Opportunity Authority was given final word Wednesday that it would receive $155,294 in federal funds to fight the war on poverty.

The grant will provide $4,096 more than EOA officials originally asked for—but it may already have saved the program from the poor house.

Regional officials of the Office of Economic Opportunity, which processed the application, said the $4,096 difference was the result of "arithmetical errors and minor changes" the government spotted in DeKalb's 23-page application.

According to the program outlined by DeKalb, officials said, the organization would require $155,294 to do the job instead of the $151,198 it first requested.

Mrs. Margaret Lewis, chairman of the DeKalb EOA, explained that the formal application was "prepared in a hurry" and local officials may have made some typographical errors.

"We had to get the application finished in two weeks," she said. "Fortunately, the OEO had two full months to look it over."

The grant includes:

1. A total of $64,273 to establish a neighborhood health center in Stone Mountain, where EOA staff members could counsel low-income families.

2. Another $52,611 for a county-wide adult education program, offering evening courses leading to a high school equivalency certificate. The program would enable high school dropouts to complete entrance requirements needed for vocational training schools.

3. The sum of $11,910 for continuation of the Decatur "Head Start" program, comprising summer enrichment classes to give underprivileged children the cultural background that they will need to compete with middle class youngsters in the first grade.

4. Finally, $54,348 for a four-man central administrative staff, including a director, three program assistants and a secretary.

The DeKalb EOA had requested only $64,023 for the neighborhood center and $13,733 for the Head Start program.

The federal grant brings the total war chest on poverty in DeKalb to $188,142. That figure includes $14,898 appropriated Tuesday by the county commission, $14,865 from the DeKalb school board, $1,685 from the city of Stone Mountain and $1,400 from the city of Decatur.

As soon as the grant was announced Wednesday, Mrs. Lewis made public the appointment of Peter S. Jones, former DeKalb County purchasing agent, as administrator. Jones, purchasing agent since 1962, resigned March 4 after a running controversey with DeKalb Commission Chairman Brince Manning.

Jones, 59, spent several years in South America as a senior foreign service officer and served as a parttime State department consultant in Atlanta.

The DeKalb application, prepared by Mrs. Lewis and state OEO consultant Mrs. Hellice Clark, received praise from members of the regional OEO staff—the federal agency which flatly rejected DeKalb's first proposal submitted more than a year ago.

One high OEO official, who declined to be named, said privately he thought the DeKalb program was "one of the best I've seen anywhere" because its board of directors includes so many underprivileged persons.

"The DeKalb EOA certainly goes far to give representation to the people it's supposed to serve," he said. The board includes 30 members representing 10 civic associations, many from Negro communities throughout the county.

Approval of the grant, announced through the office of Rep. James A. Mackay, climaxed one year and three days of controversy, charges of foot-dragging, and later a last-ditch effort to get the poverty program on its feet.

Last year the regional OEO flatly turned down DeKalb's application, terming it "too broad in scope" and poorly planned.

A few months later, EOA board chairman J. N. Burnett resigned suddenly amid speculation he found the job "frustrating" because he did not feel he could get proper cooperation from the county commission.

Last fall, after Mrs. Lewis assumed the chairmanship, the commission decided to complete the highly complex application at any cost, and debated whether to hire a private consultant, seek state help or join Fulton County's poverty program.

In February, DeKalb approached the state OEO for help, and Mrs. Clark was assigned as a consultant. The application was submitted March 4—three days after the federal deadline.

GOP Group Charges Scandal, Asks Dismantling of OEO

OEO

AC 5/29/66

WASHINGTON, May 28 (AP)—Abuses, scandals and mismanagement are destroying the antipoverty program, say a group of House Republicans who want new legislation to solve the problems of the poor.

They urge dismantling of the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO), which runs the program, enlarging the role of state and local governments, and tightening congressional control over spending of antipoverty funds.

Eight of nine Republicans on the House Education and Labor Committee joined in assailing the present program and presenting an alternative.

Their views are expressed in a 100-page dissenting report on a bill approved by the committee's Democratic majority to carry the antipoverty program into its third year. The GOP report foreshadows a bitter fight when the bill comes to the House floor next month.

In place of the committee bill, which would authorize $1.75 billion for the coming fiscal year, the Republicans offer a program they call the Opportunity Crusade, which would continue the present programs, but with redefined goals, standards and administration.

IT WOULD authorize $1.4 billion in federal money and call for partial matching of funds by local and state agencies to produce a total of $1.98 billion for the various programs.

They would place the Job Corps and Neighborhood Youth Corps in the Labor Department, adult education programs in the Office of Education, and leave only the Community Action Programs and the Domestic Peace Corps in the OEO.

The report accuses the Democrats of "one of the sorriest exhibitions of political partisanship . . . that Congress has ever witnessed" in drafting the pending bill.

The Democrats wasted $200,000 Congress appropriated for an investigation of the antipoverty by taking only a superficial look at it, says the report. They then conducted brief hearings loaded with favorable witnesses and worked on the bill in private party caucuses from which the GOP members were excluded, the dissenters assert.

THE RESULT, the report says, is a bill that fails to correct widely publicized weaknesses and abuses and leaves the OEO free "to stumble into another year of operations without the restraint of congressional directives."

Turn to Page 18, Column 4

The Republicans deal harshly with the present operation of the Job Corps camps, Neighborhood Youth Corps, and Community Action Programs under the OEO.

The Job Corps camps, residential centers for training young men and women, have become places of internal terror and danger to nearby communities because of haphazard screening methods, they report.

"The philosophy of Job Corps officials is so ridiculously soft and confused that they will excuse almost any behavior by an enrollee," they say.

The report cites numerous examples of what it calls corruption, scandal and abuses in the Neighborhood Youth Corps, which provides jobs in public agencies for youths living at home.

And the communitywide programs aimed at specific local problems, it says, comprise "the most confused, mismanaged and ineffective effort of the entire war-on-poverty program."

The report is signed by Reps. William H. Ayres, Ohio; Albert H. Quie, Minn.; Charles E. Goodell, N.Y.; John M. Ashbrook, Ohio; Dave Martin, Neb.; Alphonzo Bell, Calif.; Glenn Andrews, Ala., and Edward J. Gurney, Fla.; of the Republican committee members, only Rep. Ogden R. Reid, N.Y., did not join in the dissent.

Kennedy Brothers Attach $570-Million to Program

NYT 8/24/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 23 — The Senators Kennedy succeeded today in adding about $570-million to President Johnson's antipoverty budget.

Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York, is expected to propose $300-million more in the full Labor and Public Welfare Committee. His brother, Edward M., Democrat of Massachusetts, joined him in today's amendment.

The subcommittee on employment, manpower and poverty completed work today on the anti-poverty bill. Chairman Joseph S. Clark, Democrat of Pennsylvania, said he would try to get full committee action this week and then seek Senate action before Labor Day to avoid a possible civil rights filibuster.

The subcommittee action raised the antipoverty budget for the 1967 fiscal year from $1.75-billion to $2.32-billion.

Health Aid Proposed

Edward Kennedy proposed raising the Administration bill by $100-million to finance health services in poor neighborhoods. That was agreed to in principle. The language of his amendment was not before the committee.

Robert Kennedy led a move to add $200-million for Head Start, a project for pre-school poor children. That will go to the full committee without recommendation. The subcommittee included both these items in its $2.32-billion.

Robert Kennedy also moved to add $300-million for what he called "special Impact programs." That led to a dispute with his Republican colleague from New York, Jacob K. Javits. A Javits associate said the language of the Kennedy proposal did not make clear that the program would aid the ghettos as Senator Kennedy said it would.

Democratic sources said that Senator Javits threatened a filibuster in the closed meeting, whereupon Senator Kennedy withdrew the $300-million amendment with the intention of renewing his proposal in the full committee.

Salaries Limited

The subcommittee, instead of writing a specific dollar ceiling on salaries financed by Office of Economic Opportunity funds, inserted an amendment limiting salaries to those paid for comparable work in the area, unless the O.E.D. director makes a finding of necessity for paying above these ceilings.

The subcommittee also adopted several Javits amendments to combine Job Corps and Neighborhood Youth Corps centers in certain situations, in addition to the existing separate structure for these programs. It also voted to co-ordinate these and other manpower training programs so there would be a joint system of counseling for young people who enter any of these programs.

The antipoverty bill adopted by the House Education and Labor Committee, which is still awaiting floor action, stays within the President's budget but reduces funds for community action programs and earmarks much of these funds for specific programs.

The Senate subcommittee would give the antipoverty agency $944-million for community action, instead of the House committee total of $832-million, and would also give the agency more flexibility in allocating funds to various community action projects.

The subcommittee restored to the Job Corps the $228-million in the President's budget. The House committee had cut it to $200-million. The Senate group left undisturbed the House committee figure of $496-million for the Neighborhood Youth Corps. That is $196-million more than the President proposed.

Rights Act Violations Cited in 25 Summer Programs

NYT 8/26/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 25 — The Office of Economic Opportunity has refused funds to sponsors of 25 summer Head Start programs, citing violations of civil rights as the reason.

The sponsors are in seven Southern states. The poverty agency did not disclose the sum of funds being withheld.

Samuel F. Yette, the agency's special assistant for civil rights, said that the sponsors had used three principal methods to circumvent the intent of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Mr. Yette said the sponsors had committed the following violations:

¶They refused to use any white schools in areas having substantial numbers of eligible white children, even though white schools were equally as available as Negro schools.

¶They selected all-Negro staffs.

¶They used unequal recruitment efforts for Negro and white children. Negro families were personally solicited, while white families received only a general notice.

In no instance did Negroes oppose white participation in the programs, Mr. Yette said. Opposition came from school and other local officials who failed to meet civil rights criteria.

The nonfunded sponsors were in local communities in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina.

Twenty-four of the 25 did not contest the refusal, but the Little River Community Action Committee in Appling, Ga., did. However, a hearing examiner of the Civil Service Commission upheld the poverty agency's decision.

On May 20, three agency regional directors—Frank K. Sloan of Atlanta, William H. Crook of Austin, and Sidney H. Woolner of Washington, D. C.—reported that some local school board officials had been designing all-Negro programs in violation of the Civil Rights Act.

At that time the directors warned that such projects might be denied Federal funds unless such discriminatory plans were corrected. This was carried out today.

In some cases where sponsors operated programs in more than one community, only those programs in violation were refused funds, the agency said.

House Republicans Call for Shriver's Resignation

9/28/66

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — House Republicans hammered at the $1.75-billion antipoverty bill for two hours oday.

They said Sargent Shriver, who directs the program, should resign on grounds of inadequate management, employment of too many consultants at high pay rates and "profiteering" by two companies in the Job Corps program.

"The Office of Economic Opportunity has produced more bureaucratic wealth than any other agency," said Albert H. Quie of Minnesota, one of the Republican floor managers.

The agency, he said, has more employes in supergrades than the Office of Education, which has a budget more than twice the size of the antipoverty agency. That, said Mr. Quie, is an evasion of "the clear intent of the law." Supergrade salaries are in the $16,000 to $18,000 brackets.

The authorization bill debated today sets a ceiling on how much Congress can appropriate for the poverty program; the actual appropriation, which may be lower, will be voted later.

The bill would expand the Neighborhood Youth Corps and the Head Start programs, at the expense of Community Action projects, and would reduce discretionary use of Community Action funds by earmarking much of them for specific kinds of projects.

The debate, save for one brief flare-up, simmered on an almost fireless cooker. The Republicans, in an effort to stir up interest and produce an audience, forced quorum calls when attendance dwindled. Four of these, consuming close to two hours, brought more than 300 members to the chamber each time. Attendance then dwindled to about 20.

The anxiety that usually appears on the majority side when an important bill's outlook is in doubt was not apparent.

The conflict is expected to sharpen tomorrow when the Republicans start offering perhaps dozens of amendments to the amortization bill and both sides will need members on the floor for head counts on short notice.

The Republicans propose to fragment the Office of Economic Opportunity, leaving Mr. Shriver with two programs, Community Action and Vista (Volunteers in Service to America). They would transfer the Job Corps and the Neighborhood Youth Corps to the Labor Department, Head Start and adult education to the Office of Education, work experience to other sections of the Health, Education and Welfare Department, and the loan programs to the Small Business Administration.

Representative James H. Scheuer of the Bronx, one of the Democrats who rose to the defense of the antipoverty program, said it was absurd for anyone to say that the United States, in the most prosperous period in its history, could not finance a program that costs less in one year than the Vietnam war costs in a month.

Representative Sam M. Gibbons of Florida, who parceled out the speaking time for the Democrats, spoke of the failure of the Women's Job Corps Center in St. Petersburg, Fla., saying that "it was national publicity, much of it generated in political spite, that threw it into a tailspin."

The allegations of "profiteering" have been cited by Republicans in the past. One case involved the Kanawha Hotel in Charleston, W. Va., which the Women's Job Corps leased. Mr. Quied said the Government had guaranteed the company that owned the hotel $94,800 a year "clear profit," and spent $345,000 remodeling a property that had been appraised at $250,000.

Another allegation involved Consolidated American Services, which held an agency contract to find feasibility sites for Job Corps centers. Charles E. Goodell, Republican of upstate New York, said an officer of the company, who had made contributions to the Democrats, received the contract although the company in the beginning had no staff or competence in the field.

House Votes Poverty Bill; Mandates Role for Poor

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29—The House approved tonight a $1.75-billion authorization bill to extend the antipoverty program for 1967. Before doing so it wrote in a specific mandate to enforce a provision for "maximum feasible participation" of the poor in the direction of community action projects.

The vote on the bill was 210 to 156.

The measure tightens Congressional control over the distribution of funds for community action and increases allotments for the Neighborhood Yotuh Corps and the preschool project Head Start.

Republicans, on a motion by Paul A. Fino of the Bronx, temporarily scuttled the bill, but the Democrats regrouped their missing numbers and reversed the action.

The senate expects to take up its own antipoverty bill tomorrow. It would authorize about three-quarters of a billion dollars more than the house bill.

The House amendment on the role of the poor stipulated that "the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity shall not approve a community action program which is conducted, administered or coordinated by a board on which representatives of the poor do not comprise at least one-third of the membership."

Training Cost Ceiling

The amendment also requires that the representatives of the poor be "selected by the residents of the areas of concentration of poverty, with special emphasis on participation by the residents of the area who are poor."

The House also wrote into the bill a limit of $7,500 a year on the cost of training a Jobs Corps enrollee. Job Corps officials testified in March that in 1965 costs averaged $9,120 for each male enrollee, exclusive of capital outlays for conditioning the Job Corps centers.

Mrs. Edith Green, Democrat of Oregon, sponsored the $7,500 ceiling after Republicans had failed by three votes in an effort last night to impose a $7,000 ceiling.

The mandate to give one-third of the community action seats to representatives of the poor, selected by the poverty areas themselves, was sponsored by a Republican and accepted by the Democratic leadership. The sponsor was Albert H. Quie of Minnesota.

"I see no objection to this amendment," Sam M. Gibbons, Democrat of Florida, floor manager for the majority, said.

Picked by Politicians

The Office of Economic Opportunity reported that at present 29 per cent of the members of community action boards were poor or representatives of the poor. But this is an overall average, which means that some cities have less than 29 per cent poverty representation on their boards.

More important, many of these poverty representatives were chosen by local political leaders, not by the residents of the poor areas, as the House amendment would require.

The amendment does not stipulate the method of selection. It could be done by election, as at present in Philadelphia, or by "town meeting" or other method.

The representatives chosen do not have to be poor themselves. The current economic definition of poverty is an annual income below $3,130 for a city family of four. Each additional child raises the figure by $500.

Several Democrats spoke for the amendment, but one, Wayne L. Hays of Ohio, denounced it. He said he had no objection to involvement of the poor if it was for the purpose of education. Otherwise, he said, "it would be just as logical to say that one-third of all defeated members of Congress ought to have seats in the House."

Mr. Hays spoke of people who have been "failures all their lives" and said that to give management seats "to one-third of those who never have been successful does not make sense."

"It will make more headaches than before," he said.

The amendment was adopted on a voice vote.

The Republicans tried unsuccessfully to transfer the Job Corps from the Office of Economic Opportunity to the Labor Department. This was among a score of Republican proposals to fragment the agency or otherwise alter the program.

Poverty Bill Cut To Johnson Size

AC 10/5/66

Senate Votes, 49 to 20, For $1.75 Billion Total

WASHINGTON (UPI)—The Senate bowed before President Lyndon B. Johnson's economy drive Tuesday and cut its $2.5 billion anti-poverty bill back to the $1.75 billion budget estimate.

After approving Senate Republican leader Everett M. Dirksen's proposal to slash the bill by $750 million, the Senate passed the anti-poverty measure and sent it to the house. The vote on final passage was 49 to 20.

The Dirksen amendment chopped the bill back to the amount requested by Johnson and approved earlier by the House.

PUT IN CURBS

After considerable debate and two roll calls, 39 to 32 and 38 to 32, the Senate approved a modified amendment offered originally by Sen. Harry F. Byrd, D-Va. It would forbid use of anti-poverty funds to help any individual who "incites, promotes, encourages or carries on a riot," helps others to do so, or is a member of any organization designated as subversive by the attorney general.

Passage came after Democratic leader Mike Mansfield joined Republicans on the economy bandwagon. Mansfield proposed a smaller cut—back to $2.1 billion—but Dirksen stepped in with his substitute which was approved after he gave it one of his oratorical launchings.

BOTH BILLS SAME

The vote left the budget estimates, the Senate bill and the House bill with the same price tag. However, the bills differ on allocation of authorizations to various anti-poverty programs and must be reconciled.

Both Mansfield and Dirksen offered their reductions after being called to the White House Monday and asked by President Johnson to help in cutting over-budget additions from pending legislation.

"You should have heard him on the budget," Dirksen told the Senate. "He fulminated like hurricane Inez about what we were doing to the budget."

Mansfield said the Senate Labor Committee's $2.5 billion bill was "much too high." He said "it is about time that the Senate not let the President assume all the responsibility for amounts in excess of budget recommendations."

Sen. Joseph S. Clark, D-Pa., manager of the bill, pleaded with the Senate not to go below Mansfield's $2.1 billion figure.

Sen. Wayne Morse, D-Ore., opposed the Mansfield amendment and criticized President Johnson for being "apparently willing to have the war in Viet Nam paid for by the poverty stricken . . . the school children . . . of America."

THE NEW YORK TIMES, WEDN

Poverty Fund Quotas Set by Senate-House Parley

10/12/64

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 11 — Senate-House conferees on the antipoverty bill allocated the $1.75-billion authorization today with most of the restrictions and earmarkings voted by the House.

Both chambers had authorized the same total but had not agreed on how to distribute the sum among the various programs. The joint conference agreed on that today, subject to expected approval by the Senate and the House.

The allocations put limits on the discretion of Sargent Shriver, director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, and will mean that few, if any, new community action programs can be started unless they fall into the new categories written into the law in the present session of Congress.

The Job Corps was allowed $211-million, compared with the $228-million requested in the President's budget.

The Neighborhood Youth Corps was allowed $410-million, which is $110-million more than was asked.

Bracketed with those two programs in Title II of the bill was a new program to generate employment in crowded city areas having heavy unemployment. It was sponsored by New York's Senators, Jacob K. Javits, Republican, and Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat. It was allowed $75-million.

Earlier in the day, a Citizens Crusade Against Poverty report made available today finds that Mississippi's 28-county Head Start program, recently eliminated by Sargent Shriver, was a "well-administered, carefully organized, creatively run organization demonstrating integrity, fiscal responsibility and managerial competency."

The report, prepared by a board of inquiry after a visit to Mississippi, said that charges made by Mr. Shriver's Office of Economic Opportunity, "even if true, do not in the board's opinion constitute grave enough defects to support a judgment to terminate the program."

Shriver Standing Fast

"All of the charges taken together do not dictate termination if weighed against C.D.G.M.'s (Child Development Group of Mississippi) record of achievement and continuous improvement," the report said.

"A differential standard with regard to what defects mandate termination appears to have been applied to C.D.G.M."

Walter P. Reuther, president of the crusade, said he was trying to arrange a meeting with Mr. Shriver to present the report. Mr. Shriver said last night he would hold to his decision. The grounds for it are that the child development group failed to meet minimum standards of managerial competence.

The crusade's board of inquiry said: "We are unable to avoid the conclusion that the charges levied are a thin mask for a politically dictated decision, a decision which is all the more tragic in that it represents a yielding to those forces which have stood in historical opposition to progress for the poor and underprivileged in Mississippi, including Senators John Stennis and James O. Eastland who have opposed all civil rights, labor and antipoverty legislation.

"We view this as a symbolic instance, not simply of yielding to political pressures, but of yielding to pressures which are direct and irreconcilable opposition to the goals of the program and the intended beneficiaries of the program.

"We cannot account for this decision on the basis of charges which are so insubstantial, so trival, so unsupported in fact, so exaggerated and inflated and not supported by objective inquiry."

Clark Fears Measure May Die as Talks Deadlock on Community Action Plan

10/13/66

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12—Senator Joseph S. Clark reported today after a fruitless Senate-House conference that "there may not be an antipoverty bill." The Senator, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, is chairman of the conference.

The Senate and the House have passed bills authorizing $1.75-billion for another year. But the bills differ in many respects. Conferees from both chambers agreed yesterday on how to distribute that sum among the many antipoverty channels, but the negotiations deadlocked today on other conflicts in the two bills.

Some sources thought Senator Clark was merely expressing a frustration of the moment. Nevertheless, the differences are real, and they reflect some of the political undertones of the antipoverty program.

In general, the House conferees seem to regard free-wheeling community action programs as political nuisances, if not threats. They propose to channel most of the community action money into specific programs, thereby limiting the discretion of Sargent Shriver, director of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Some of these controls — like limiting the number of top-graded employes—would add to the difficulties of Mr. Shriver's talent search.

Another Huse provision that is causing trouble would require not just permit — the director of the Economic Opportunity office to channel 20 per cent of the community action money into independent agencies. This is regarded on the Senate side as an attempt to weaken the community action agencies.

Associated Press

Senator Joseph S. Clark

Another provision is sponsored personally by Representative Adam ClaytonPowell,Manhattan Democrat who is chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. It would not permit the payment of more than $12,500 a year in Federal Funds to a official of a community action agency.

Raises Are Limited

A related provision would not permit a community action agency to pay a salary that gave an official more than a 20 per cent raise over his last previous salary.

The proposed restriction on top talent in the economic opportunity office itself — as distinguished from the local community-run programs — would limit the number of officials getting salaries in the $20,000-to-$25,000 range to 1 per cent of the total number of employes. The effect of this, according to the economic opportunity office, would be the forced resignation of 24 super-grade employes.

Still another restriction would reduce the funds for research and demonstration projects — the innovative feature of community action — by two-thirds.

The House also took a lot of Mr. Shriver's freedom of movement away by earmarking the sums to be spent on specified programs, such as narcotics rehabilitation, family loans, legal services and certain kinds of subprofessional employment.

Some Steam Lost

The Senate is inclined to give the agency more discretion, but its argument against earmarking for specific programs lost some of its steam when Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York and Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts managed to insert specific sums for two specific programs, health centers and employment generating projects in crowded, substandard areas.

There is also a dispute over how to take antipoverty employes out of politics. It looked today as though the Senate version would prevail. This would make employes of community action agencies subject to the Hatch Act, which forbids partisan political activity.

The House version is broader. It might prohibit, for example, a Head Start teacher who was getting an insignificant, part-time wage from taking any partisan role.

Senator Clark called a meeting for 9 A.M. tomorrow to try again. He is being crowded by the adjournment goal of Oct. 22 and by other measures, such as the education bills, that are making demands on the time of some of the poverty bill conferees.

The conferees also found themselves harassed by a fresh rumor that the appropriations committees might not allow the full $1.75-billion even if the authorization bill finally passed. An authorization is never a guarantee that the cash will be forthcoming.

Poverty Bill Wins Conferee Approval

AC 10/14/66

WASHINGTON (AP)—Senate-House conferees agreed late Thursday on a compromise $1.75 billion bill to finance the antipoverty program for a third year.

The final form of the bill would allocate all of the money to specific war on poverty programs in a far more rigid manner than President Lyndon B. Johnson proposed.

This was a victory for the House delegation led by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, D-N.Y.

IN TROUBLE?

But, Powell told reporters he felt the bill might be "in serious trouble in the House" when it is brought up next week. The Senate is expected to act first, probably on Monday.

Rep. William H. Ayers, R-Ohio, said none of the three House Republican conferees signed the report because it would drop a House provision to limit to 29 the number of Super-grade positions in the Office of Economic Opportunity, the anti-poverty agency.

This would allow present law authorizing 53 such positions to prevail.

NOT ALL FILLED

Powell said this is the principal reason he expected it to be difficult to get the compromise bill through the House.

Not all of these jobs, paying from $20,075 to $25,800, have been filled.

Sen. Joseph S. Clark, D-Pa., head of the Senate delegation, said the final product "is the best we could work out and should be acceptable to the administration. At least it will keep the program going in the years ahead."

Sen. Jacob K. Javits, R-N.Y., said he also regarded the bill as "a fair compromise."

Javits pointed out that the administration will have some flexibility because it can transfer funds between titles in the bill up to a limit of 10 per cent.

DRIVE ON POVERTY FACES CUTBACKS

Election Results in House Presage Bleak Future

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12—A bleak future for the antipoverty program, at least in its present form, was written large in Tuesday's election.

In short, 45 House members who voted for the antipoverty bill will not return. All but a few are Democrats who are being raplaced by Republicans. If it is assumed that the replacements will oppose the present antipoverty program, as the party leaders did in the recent session of Congress, a bill renewing that program could not survive in the House.

A vote in the House on Sept. 29 tested the program's standing. The motion called for striking the enacting clause—killing the bill. The motion failed, 208 to 156. If 45 of the 208 switched to the other side, the bill would be killed, 201 to 163.

Not all the Great Society programs need legislation every year to continue functioning, although nearly all need annual appropriations. The Office of Economic Opportunity needs both legislation and appropriations to function.

Powell Action Noted

The amendments of 1966 authorize some of the components of the antipoverty program to run as long as four years. However, Representative Adam Clayton Powell, Manhattan Democrat, who is chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, saw to it that no funds were authorized to be appropriated beyond the present fiscal year.

The antipoverty office, therefore, will have to get authority from that committee and from the House before it can go to the Appropriations Committee, which can vote only such funds as have been authorized by law.

Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, the Republican leader, specifically mentioned the antipoverty program as one that will get "a good hard look" in the new Congress. Another remark, in the same interview, was:

"I should judge the scalpel will be wielded rather freely."

Even Senator Mike Mansfield of Montana, the Democratic leader, said, "It should be the time to stop, look and listen."

The Administration this year held the antipoverty budget far below the plans that were laid when the drive was tooling up. It was far below the office's request. The claims of the war in Vietnam were blamed.

Congress Cut Budget

Tight as the antipoverty budget was, in the opinion of officials, Congress cut it even deeper, from $1.75-billion to $1.61-billion.

Congress, short of abolishing the program outright, may cut back the community action phase, or tighten its control still more and transfer some of the other operations to Cabinet-level agencies, unless the Administration does that first.

The recent Congress limited the antipoverty office's discretion in using community action funds, diverting more than two-thirds of them to specific employment projects and to Head Start, the project for preschool children.

Head Start has been reported headed for the Health, Education and Welfare Department. The Administration, however, has a special panel working on a possible new child development program and it is far from ready to make recommendations.

The Republicans tried to transfer the Job Corps, an urban and conservation center training project, to the Labor Department. The move failed, but party leaders are expected to try again, unless they decide on outright abolition.

Field Foundation Sends Help to Mississippi Project

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 10—Mississippi's original and embattled Head Start program is getting some private nourishment while it presses the fight for refunding by the Office of Economic Opportunity.

There is evidence that the organization, known as C.D.G.M. for Child Development Group of Mississippi, is making headway. The Field Foundation, Inc., said it had given the group $20,000 "with a promise of substantially more."

Leslie Dunbar, at the foundation offices in New York City, would not mention any other figure, saying only that "it is an open end thing."

"We are prepared to keep a skeleton operation alive," he said, adding that the project needed at least $11-million a year to function at full strength and that the foundation could not supply such an amount.

The antipoverty office cut off funds for the project two months ago, setting off a nationwide protest by private antipoverty organizations, church and civil rights groups and prominent individuals. The Federal agency charged financial and programatic mismanagement, including a failure to bring poor white children into the project.

Vice President Humphrey, at the request of Protestant church representatives, said this week he would try to mediate the dispute. A member of Mr. Humphrey's staff, after checking into the status of the dispute, said the Vice President's offer still stood but that he had advised the Mississippi group's spokesman to proceed with a scheduled meeting with antipoverty officials on Wednesday.

"I think they are reliably close on the remaining problems," Mr. Humphrey's spokesman said. "My judgment is that the most constructive thing for them is to go ahead with that meeting, but if they have strong feelings that that is not good procedure, to let us know. The Vice President's office is ready to be as helpful as we can."

Much of the uproar against the termination of funds for the project was generated by a belief that Sargent Shriver had bowed to pressure by Mississippi Democratic leaders who charged that the project had been closely allied with civil rights extremists.

That such pressure existed is nowhere denied. However, antipoverty sources said that the director had acted on the unanimous advice of his senior staff when he insisted on a recommendation of some kind from that group. The staff at first wanted to delay a decision, it was reported.

Staff Demoralized

His decision, on the other hand, caused dismay and demoralization among many in the lower echelons of the antipoverty agency.

Mr. Shriver's office has insisted that the fund cutoff was never intended to be final, provided the preschool project would make changes in its operation and personnel. The agency listed nine conditions the project must meet. The group filed its answers to these conditions and the office said they were not adequate.

One of the conditions was the replacement of the executive director, John Mudd. Project directors so far have refused to accept that condition, insisting that Mr. Mudd is fully qualified.

Some leading champions of the project who were most vehement in attacking Mr. Shriver in advertisements and public statements say now, privately, they are wondering whether their fire should have been directed, instead, at President Johnson.

These second thoughts are provoked by the predicament in which Mr. Shriver and his agency find themselves. The White House apparently gave the antipoverty bill a low priority in its lobbying this year, with the result that passage was delayed, its appropriation request was cut and restrictions were written into its community action budget.

Mr. Shriver is taking the heat from community action agencies all over the country, although there is little he can do to restore the fund cut he recently ordered.

At the same time, reports of the impending dismemberment of the antipoverty office have demoralized his staff. In the absence of reassurance from the White House, Mr. Shriver is speculating aloud about a future for himself elsewhere.

OFFICE OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY - DEC. 12, 1966

BAYARD RUSTIN, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, reaffirmed the great need for the Office of Economic Opportunity at an informal session attended by about 120 staffers at OEO headquarters last week.

"This is not the time for criticism," he said,"cutting down these innovative OEO programs would only aggravate the conditions leading to frustration, dissent, and violence: a lack of adequate jobs, of decent housing and schooling." He urged all supporters of the War on Poverty to help save the program by making new alliances based not upon sentiment, but upon mutual interest, in order to continue the new social programs.

Rustin urged OEO's support of the Institute-sponsored "Freedom Budget," a $100-plus billion plan which he says will cure the social and economic ills of the poor in ten years. It is backed by organized labor, civil rights organizations and church groups. The budget calls for a total mobilization of the nation's resources, with a timetable for the accomplishment of its objectives. Provisions include a guaranteed annual income, with "gradual elimination of the whole patchwork of public assistance programs which are now highly inefficient and costly," a $2 minimum wage, public works "far beyond what President Franklin Roosevelt was able to see," and full employment.

Rustin doesn't expect all of the ideas to be adopted, but he does expect it to be the start of a dialogue on the problem.

MUNICIPAL OFFICIALS FROM ACROSS THE NATION voted this week at the conference of the National League of Cities in Las Vegas to request more Federal anti-poverty money. The two-thirds majority vote represents a reversal of the League's former position. The newly adopted resolution asks for "new non-earmarked authorizations and appropriations for fiscal 1968....to permit further orderly expansion of (OEO) programs." One strong supporter of the resolution, San Francisco Mayor John F. Shelley, recalling his city's recent riots, commented, "to throw out these programs would lead to more blood-letting. We are spending billions, but we are taking care of our country, where seeds of unrest can lead to seeds of revolutions." Milwaukee Mayor Henry W. Maier said: "The time has passed for debate on whether or not we should have a poverty program. Local governments are already committed to carry out the programs." The League's president, Detroit's Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh said: "I believe strongly, that the National League of cities must make known to the Congress and the President--and make it known in not uncertain terms--that the work of the poverty program must be continued, that it must be properly funded. And that the Office of Economic Opportunity must be kept as an operating agency."

IN A REVERSAL OF an earlier position, the Tennessee State Bar Association recently adopted a resolution pledging support and assistance to the Legal Services Program of the Office of Economic Opportunity. The resolution said in part: "The Tennessee Bar Association and all other State Bar Associations should play a more active role in the development of the program of providing legal services to the poor." To date, three Legal Services Programs have been funded in Tennessee. MISSISSIPPI UNIT GETS POVERTY AID

Grant Made and Head Stays After 2-Month Fight

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 17 — The Child Development Group of Mississippi has won its long struggle for a new Head Start grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The project, which is backed by the Presbyterian Board of Missions, will get $8-million for 12 months, $5-million of which will come out of the antipoverty program's appropriation for the current fiscal year.

The Mississippi group had asked for more than $20-million for this, its third grant. However, with the reduced funds it will operate in fewer counties.

Despite the lower amount, the group appeared to have won most of the emotionally loaded arguments in its two months of negotiations with the Office of Economic Opportunity. John H. Mudd, the project's controversial executive director, will remain in that post for the present under the terms of the new grant.

Two of the agency's conditions were the removal of Mr. Mudd and the Rev. James McCree, chairman of the group's board of directors. The dispute over Mr. McCree was settled with a requirement that he run for election by an enlarged board of directors within 30 days.

The Office of Economic Opportunity had held out on its demand for the replacement of Mr. Mudd. Even when the agreement was completed and announced, the agency said that Mr. Mudd's work would be subject to re-evaluation after 90 days and that a final decision would then be made on his retention.

However, Mr. Mudd said today that there was no such condition, written or oral. A provision for a 60-day trial period was embodied in the agency's offer of a grant as late as yesterday afternoon, but that was deleted in favor of a provision that Richard Davies, a management consultant, in Washington, would participate in management decisions by the Mississippi project. Mr. Mudd said he was delighted to have that help.

The grant provides for a year-round project for 5,900 to 6,100 preschool children and their parents, directed toward physical health and social and educational orientation.

The Mississippi group had asked for more than $20-million. However, its geographical scope has been reduced from 28 counties to 17 because, in recent months, new community action agencies have been set up in the other counties. They will handle Head Start projects there.

The Office of Economic Opportunity last Oct. 2 suspended funds for the Mississippi project, charging management and program inadequacies. That decision gave rise to protests by organizations that accused the antipoverty agency of giving in to pressure from Mississippi political leaders. These leaders had charged that the Head Start project was tied to militance in the civil rights movement.

The new grant provides that the project's board of directors will confine its operations to the program stipulated in the grant and not undertake activities "not in accordance with the approved program."

The project served few white children but the sponsors said that white people were to blame. Under the reorganization, the board of directors will have 19 members instead of 17 and six will be white.

Mr. Mudd, who is 27 years old, is white and comes from a Haverford, Pa., family that has contributed money to the children of Mississippi. Mr. Mudd expects that his work in Mississippi will become the basis for a doctoral thesis in government and economics at Harvard.

Dear Mr. Dow:

Thank you for your letter of December 14 and the outlines of your reading programs. They look very good, but in about a month's time, the news about our paperback book project spread so rapidly and the orders began to come in so quickly that we have spent nearly all of the funds available at this time. I regret that for the moment I am having to suspend all further requests.

This paperback book project has been an experimental one, and we have the hope of being able to enlarge it in 1967. I am keeping your request in a special file and want you to know that your interest in our project will assist us in showing the demand for such books when we ask to renew our grant.

Sincerely,

Dear Miss Cole:

We would like very much to participate in the Paperback Book Project. This is true, because a large number of children and adults of our community and school are from homes of low socio-economics levels. Consequently, these children and adults have very little or no access at all to books in the home.

We are interested in using these books to initiate a program whereby these books can be read and enjoyed at school or checked out and carried home to be read.

Since we have such a large number of children and adults on this level, we would like very much to have the books in all of the catagories listed; and if at all possible, several copies of each book.

Thank you very kindly.

Very truly yours,

John

Dear Louise, I've recently been to Aiken where they are in high gear rearing to go with the Paper Back Book Project. I couldn't tell them the status of your proposal for it's continuation. Please brief me and them.

There are many other groups which would do a good and needed job, but I'll hold my horses and won't inform or alert them until I hear from you.

Dear Mrs. Ashley:

As we discussed by telephone, the Southern Regional Council has used up all the funds granted for its paperback book project. Last November and December we received so many orders that by mid-December, we had to suspend any further requests coming into the office. We hope to get another grant so that we will be able to give the requests we are saving immediate attention.

Your proposal sounds excellent, and let me say again how much we regret not being able to process your order right away. I will contact you as soon as possible if we do get another grant.

Dear Mr. Karraker:

Thank you for your interest in our paperback book project. Our "guidelines" are as follows: we have undertaken this project to encourage novel ways of getting books to people who, for a number of reasons, have very little access to reading material. We are especially interested in a program planned with the idea that, should the effort prove successful, the local group will want to expand it or spread the idea to other agencies. Since our project is experimantal, we are asking each group to send later a brief follow-up report so that we can learn about the response to the books.

Enclosed is the bibliography we have developed for applicants to use in making their selections. The total number of books you select depends simply on how many you judge will profitably be used. If this list looks good to you, we would be happy to learn how your program for such books will operate and the kinds of people you hope to serve.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Allred:

I am the Director of a Remedial Education School for the Neighborhood Youth Corps enrollees. Our students are working in various agencies in Durham under the supervision of Operation Breakthrough. These students have all dropped out of school at least six months ago, and none has completed work beyond grade 10. They are now working three nights a week in preparation for the high school equivalency test.

Many of the students have expressed a desire for library books which they could read for pleasure. I have contributed several of my own books to a make-shift library, and these books have been used often. Now I havelearned that there may be books available through the Paperback Book Distribution Project. Could you send me further information on this subject?

My husband and I are also resident advisors for the Living and Learning Project, a project sponsored by the Duke University Religious Council. We live in a poverty neighborhood and supervise a group of Duke students, summer and winter, as they work in the Edgemont neighborhood. These students would like to begin a small collection of primary-level reading materials for the children who often come to the house for tutoring or pleasure.

If your agency could meet either of these needs, I would certainly be pleased. Any information will be appreciated.

Sincerely,

Dear Miss Cole,

I want to thank you for all the books you have sent this year to be used in the study program of the Glynn County Community Service Center. They have been a great asset to our program.

I have been pleased with the enthusiasm the children have shown toward the books. The circulation has been much greater than was anticipated. In our program the simple books have received the most circulation. In fact many more of these books could have been used to the extent I would like to have seen. Most of our students do not read well so these books are too difficult for them.

The fact that books have been available to these children and that they have used and enjoyed them, is a credit to your program. We are grateful our Center was a recipient of the books.

Dear Miss Cole,

In cleaning our desk, I found this list of books which I failed to send. If this program is still offered, we would be most grateful to make use of these books in our summer program (at the beginning of August). Later when the school term begins, they will serve the Day School, which was the original intention for sending for them. Is there any charge involved?

Thank you and please forgive my neglect in sending this.

Dear Will Allred:

At last I have some time to send you this report on our use of the books we acquired from the Southern Regional Council. The three enclosed reports tell how the books are being used in Sumter, S. C., Johns Island, S. C., and Clairfield, Tenn.. There are two other volunteers in our program who used books but did not write reports:

Lucy Massie, Goldsboro, N. C. -- had mainly books for small children, which she used in the Bootstrap preschool class she taught this past year. The books are being kept in the Bootstrap building on Bright Street. A complete card catalog of the books has been made by the mothers of the children in the school, and the books can be checked out by people in the community. They will be used also in the preschool this coming year, which will be taught by a lady from Goldsboro.

Lynne Gilroy, Cayce, S. C. -- also had mainly books for small children, which she used in a cooperative preschool held in the old Cayce city jail, since converted into a daycare center (by means of an OEO grant). The books are kept at the center and will be used there in the daycare program this next year.

Lucy and Lynne ended their two years with us in July, and it's nice to know that the books will continue to be used in the communities where they worked. Bob Gainer, Bob Seeley, and Roger Phenix will be in their communities another year, and I'll ask them to write a further report sometime during the coming year.

After I had distributed the books to the volunteers, two other boxes of books arrived. I'll give them to one or more of our new volunteers who are just now coming to work in our program; and they'll also be able to report during the coming year on the use of the books in their communities.

Many thanks for helping us get these books.

Sincerely,

Bob Welsh

"Book Proposal" Report

I would estimate I have about 250 books—the great majority of them being for children and young people-

As I was a tutor in the local elementary school, I kept a certain amount of the books over at the schoolhouse, where they could be taken out by the students— this was quite successful and stimulated much interest. When school ended a few weeks ago, I collected the books, and moved them to my home.—where, occassionally, youngsters came and look/borrow books.

The community is now involved in a process whereby they will set up a community center program. This will involve renovating an old School building, in which the program will be housed. Hopefully, the building will be worked on this summer, and finished sometime in the fall— and the building will provide a suitable center in the valley where the books could best be shared and utilized by the local inhabitants.—a library.

In the mean time, I don't want the books to remain dormant these next summer months, and I'm thinking of running some kind of traveling-lending library, whereby I would distribute and collect the books throughout the summer.

Bob Gainer

BOOK PROPOSAL REPORT

We got about two hundred Southern Regional Council books, for all ages, with an emphasis on teenage; many of the books deal with civil rights or related subjects . The books are being kept at the Progressive Club Center library, and by four individuals on the Haut Gap PTA Grievance Committee. These individuals have been instrumental in seeing that the books get to people who will read them. At present, about 150 of the books are in active circulation. The books are being used by adults and teenagers and younger children. There is a small group of young adults which is particularly interested in civil rights-oriented material, and they are passing these books around between them. High school children have very little in their school library and there is no branch of the public library on Johns Island or Wadmalaw Island--so those who read are happy to be able to get these books. The books are presently being read by people in every area of these two islands, and we could easily make good use of another 200 to 400 books if they were to be made available. Notice that the books are available for general use has been published in the Johns Island and Wadmalaw Island Newsletter, which reaches almost all of the Negro population of the two islands.

Roger Phenix

BOOK REPORT

1. We have about 75 books for teenagers, slightly more for pre-teens. Many of our books have been borrowed and not returned. We started out with many more.

2. The books have been used as follows: Teen books in a library in the upstairs of the house, frequented by neighborhood fellows and the church yough group. A loose lending system has been the order. The pre-teen books were used in tutoring and as part of a pre-teen lending library connected with tutoring. They were quite popular, but currently are badly in need of a librarian to handle them. Tutoring is still possible for next year, when they will be again used for this purpose. They are kept in the downstairs kitchen closet with other tutoring materials. My guess is they should be moved, but we have no other place to put them.

Dear Mrs. Blake:

In the fall and spring of 1966-1967, the North Carolina Council on Human Relations participated with the Southern Regional Council, Inc. in the Paperback Book Distribution Project which was designed to put libraries in places where low-income people could use them.

Unfortunately, the funds for providing these books were exhausted some time ago and no provision was made to renew the grant so no more are currently available.

Thank you for your inquiry. Forgive my delay in answering.

Dear Mrs. Eldridge:

We are happy to hear about your effort to set up a kind of library for the people in your community. This is just the kind of project that our grant was designed to serve, and we were impressed by your letter.

Unfortunately, during last December we finished using all the funds for our paperback book project. We are hoping, however, to get another grant some time this year and have much evidence--in the form of requests we were unable to fill--of the demand for such books from groups all over the South. We are using your letter when we make our request.

In the meantime, I'm saving your order in a special file and will contact you if we do get refunded. Again, let me say how much we regret not being able to send the books right away.

Sincerely,

(Miss) Louise Cole

Dear Mr. Feaver:

It is good to hear about the group of students which you have organized, and I hope your meetings are working well.

I have to say, with much regret, that just within a month's time, the news about the paperback book project spread so rapidly and the orders began to come in so quickly that we have spent nearly all of the funds available at this time. For the moment I am having to suspend all further requests.

As you probably know, this project has been an experimental one, and we have the hope of being able to enlarge it in 1967. I am keeping your request in a special file and want you to know that your interest in our project will assist us in showing the need for such books when we ask to renew our grant.

Sincerely,

Dear Miss Cole:

The Houston Council on Human Relations is sponsoring a group of twenty Volunteers In Service To America in the Houston area. As part of that group, four of us are working in an area of Negroes and Mexican-Americans. We have found a need in this area for a study hall for the school aged children. When we spoke of this need with Mrs. Frances Duckler, acting director of the Council, she suggested that we write to you about the Southern Regional Council's Paperbook Books Project.

Our aim is to provide a supervised study hall with reference material available. We would also want to maintain a library with not only reference shelves for school material but books for leisure reading - and a section for adults with both leisure and resource material.

We do have a permanent building which we hope to have the community develop into a neighborhood activities center. The building was formerly a hotel and we are presently using some of the rooms for tutoring. It is located so as to be easily accessible to the majority of people in the community.

We feel that in providing a place in which to study - and materials to aid in studying - interest in learning can be stimulated. Many things can grow out of a library of the sort we envision and the books from your program would be a most valuable step in making the center successful.

A list of the requested books in enclosed.

Sincerely,

Gail M. Whitaker

Dear Mr. Davis:

Your plans for the use of paperback books in the neighborhood service centers sound great. I am dismayed to relate that within the past few weeks, the news about the paperback book project spread so rapidly and the orders began to come in so quickly that we have spent nearly all of the funds available at this time. I regret that for the moment I am having to suspend all further requests.

This project has been an experimental one, and we have the hope of being able to enlarge it in 1967. I am keeping your request in a special file and want you to know that your interest in our project will assist us in showing the demand for such books when we ask to renew our grant.

Sincerely,

We are pleased to inform you that the remainder of the paperback books made available from the Southern Regional Council, are scheduled for shipment by October 4, 1967. The books you will receive are not necessarily the ones you requested, because those requested are, in many cases, not available. We have, however, made an effort to send you some good books, which we hope will be useful.

We are enclosing a copy of Hooked on Books, compliments of the Atlanta News Agency. From what we have heard of this book, it should be a valuable personal asset to you.

Please keep us informed of the progress of your library and if we can be of further assistance to you.

Dear Mr. Roberts:

I appreciate your sending me copy of your letter of August 14, to Mrs. Boyd M. Franklin. We are eagerly awaiting the paperback books which you mentioned in that letter.

In order to save a drive down to Marion, North Carolina, let me suggest that these books be shipped to Mrs. Boyd M. Franklin by motor express to Linville Falls, North Carolina, in care of Linville Falls Restaurant. The motor line goes by the restaurant and they will deliver the books at that point and Mrs. Franklin can pick them up.

I would appreciate also your sending copy of the bill of lading when the books are shipped in order that we may be on the lookout for them.

This is in response to your letter of July 15, 1967 to Mr. Shawn Boles of Books for Equal Education. You were correct in inferring that the Southern Regional Council is shipping Mrs. Franklin part of the books she ordered. We only have a small amount of funds remaining in the paperback books project account; therefore, we are unable to special order any books which are not in stock with our wholesaler.

I have talked with Mr. Boles and he has assured me that he will contact you and inform you of the availability of books from his project.

We regret that we are unable to completely fill Mrs. Franklin's order; however, if conditions change we will attempt to obtain the remaining books.

I acknowledge with thanks receipt of your letter of July 5. About the same time that you were writing me a Mr. Roberts--I think that is the name--was writing from the Southern Regional Council's office to Mrs. Boyd M. Franklin, our local community librarian.

I infer from Mr. Roberts' letter that Southern Regional Council was shipping to Mrs. Franklin a part of the books she had requested. Apparently they did not have all of the books in stock. Will you please get in touch with the Southern Regional Council and learn whether or not you may supply from your store such books as they did not have.

If you can do this, I shall be very glad to have you ship them to me parcel post collect.

I do not know the list of books that Mrs. Franklin had requested but would like to see her receive all of them if it is possible to do so.

In Tucker County there are no public library facilities whatsoever. The libraries of the schools are very inadequate; some of our reference books are of prewar vintage. So due to this you can readily see that we need some type of library facilities. Hope you can be of some assistance.

To: Recipients of Paperback books

From: Bill Roberts

Under seperate cover you will receive eight(8) paperback books. These books have either been in storage at our office or they have been given to us. As a recipient of books from the Southern Regional Council's Paperback Book Project, we hope you will be able to find a use for these books.

You will also be receiving a copy of CLIMBING JACOB'S LADDER, which we consider a very valuable book. It was written by two Atlantans; Pat Watters, SRC's Director of Information and Reese Cleghorn of the Atlanta ~~CONSTITUTION~~ Journal. It is a book written from deep emotion which relays a "feeling" as well as a documented history of the civil rights and voter education movement. (For a review of the book see the December 16, 1967 issue of THE NEW REPUBLIC.)

The following book list does not include the popular books and best sellers. However they are mandatory. Specific requestss may be cited, but usually the Atlanta News Agency will pick them for us at random. We need only specify the amount of each and how many different books.

The same goes for children's books. The Atlanta News Agency carries the 29¢ Golden Shape Books, the 50¢ Sturdi Contour books, Grade one Practice Workbook Reading, 29¢ Wonderbooks, ~~called~~ and Tip Top Elf Rand McNally Golden Future Coloring Books.

Save State Pen, Warden Pleads

AC 4/24/66

By DICK HEBERT
Constitution Staff Writer

REIDSVILLE, Ga.—"We're not doing the job at all," Warden A. L. Dutton was saying.

He was touring his sprawling state prison with a reporter. It wasn't so many years ago they were calling the prison a relic from the Dark Ages. Grim-faced, the warden was showing graphically how progress hasn't brought the prison much beyond the Middle Ages.

—In one cell block the mentally ill wait out their time without hope of treatment—a bare-chested man promising he won't go berserk again if allowed back on his job; another inmate curled on his bunk, petting a kitten; a third chasing a pet rabbit from under his bunk.

—Prisoners with arrested tuberculosis mingle with other convicts. Their cases could become active again anytime and infect others. One out of every four of these arrested cases will have to be sent back to Battey State Hospital at Rome.

—A whole floor of cell blocks goes without guards because there aren't enough to go around. Guards assigned to other floors stop by for a quick look when and if they can.

—Prisoners have no training-rehabilitation program, not much of an industrial work program. Guards are mostly untrained farmers working longer weeks than most persons would even consider on the outside—often more than 80 hours a week.

—On the 9,000-acre farm the fleet of trucks, tractors and other equipment is rusted, falling apart, out-dated.

"Everyone's sympathetic with the problems," Warden Dutton agrees. It's just that no one takes the bull by the horns. The prison is Georgia's stepchild, he says. It eats at second table.

"Sometimes I get the impression even our board (of Corrections) doesn't fight for the department. We don't have anybody lobbying for us.

"If this thing blows high as

"When you go to find a job, they tell you to come back later. They tell you: 'If we have an opening we'll hire you, but right now we don't have anything.'

"Sometimes they ask you if you got a record. You say yes and they just look at you and say no. It does get discouraging. Just by feeling in yourself while you're going in there, you know they're gonna turn you down."

First in a Series.

That was Johnnie talking. He had left Reidsville State Prison less than a week before. He's a big, able-bodied Negro 29 years old, and he wants to work and support his family. But he's got a brand on him. It says Ex-Con.

Listen again:

"You can't come in and get a job and assume the role of a husband. And that might make trouble for you. You can't help your kids, you can't help your wife, and you can't help yourself.

"You go and pay your debt to society and when you come back, your debt is still unpaid.

"If I can't assume the role of a husband, sure it might make trouble. She might have had a friend that was giving her money while I was gone. She's got to pay a note of $62 a month. She might start thinking then."

Johnnie is one of the Great Society's forgotten men. He served 28 months of a sentence for receiving stolen goods. He spent time in "the hole." Then he got a conditional release from prison and was sent out to face society.

He has three children, two in school. His wife got $99 a month from welfare people while he was in prison. And she lived in a government housing project where she was paying $35 a month until they raised it to $51.

"But when I come back we had to move. They told her before I got back. So we went and got this apartment. They don't let you live in a government project if you got a record."

Now his rent is $62 a month. Now he is jobless. The welfare people say his check will be stopped 60 days after his release.

Johnnie is not the exception. More often than most want to admit, he is the rule.

He was sent to the Community Council and they sent him to the Economic Opportunity program's Project Uplift for training and job placement. He answered questions the first day. He never went back again. No one there knows why.

Disconsolate and quiet, most likely discouraged — that was Johnnie and many like him. They aren't that way in prison, usually. It's when they start breathing free air and trying to find a job that it hits them.

A reporter talked to some of the convicts getting ready for release from Reidsville. Listen to them:

Jim: Occupation, exterminator: "I'm gonna try. I do have experience. Usually that kind of work opens up in the summertime. If I can't get that, I'll take anything I can get 'til I can get on my feet. I believe if you want a job bad enough, you can find something."

Walt: Occupation, plumber: "I never had any trouble getting a job."

Willie: Occupation, lift operator: "I'll probably find a job. I don't know."

Smith: "A man just has to get hold of anything he can get. Construction work is what I'd like to get a hold of."

A lot of them want construction work. A lot of them have never done anything else.

Things could be worse for them, but right now is a pretty good time to be getting out of prison if you look at it one way. The economy is booming. Construction is booming. There is high demand for construction labor. Unemployment is very low.

But these things don't mean too much to the ex-convict who is giving up because he doesn't think there's any help for him.

It's ex-cons like Bill and Frank that are the exceptions. They're the tradesmen, the ones with a union membership or a good standing in a skilled job. They can find work when they get out. It might not be quite at the level they left years before, but it is work.

The more typical cases are like Larry's. He's a Negro, 24 years old. He did two years for shoplifting.

A reporter visited the dark, close apartment where his mother, a small and withered woman, lives with her husband. Larry was out of prison but he wasn't home. His mother sat on the bed and talked in the dim light of the kerosene lantern.

"I told him to stay around until he could get a job. I want him to get a job, want him to find another place. He just stays around home and goes over to the barbershop and talks with the boy who cuts hair.

"I keep his clothes clean and keep food for him. He's welcome anytime. But I'm afraid for him to stay here by hisself because he has to stay clean, and I don't like what the neighbors might do.

" 'If they pin anything on you, son, you're gonna be in trouble.' That's what I told him."

It was exactly a month after his release from prison that his name was on a police report again. He was jobless and out with a girl friend when they ran into another girl friend and she got jealous.

There was a fight, and Larry ended up in Grady Hospital emergency clinic being treated for a gunshot wound in the chest. He was sent to jail, charged with assault and battery.

What it's like to be an ex-con was expressed pretty accurately in a letter to the editor from a cell at Reidsville:

"There are agencies to fight poverty, to aid small business, to train kids who drop out of school, to feed Negro people, to guarantee civil rights, but not one to help a man who has made a mess of his life get a new start or a second chance. . . .

"What is he to do . . . when he has nowhere to go and does not know where his next meal is coming from?"

The writer described prison life where a man is told "when to get up, when to go to bed, when to eat, what to eat, what to wear, how to wear it, what type of work to do, and how he must do it."

Then he is cast out to become a man who chooses for himself.

"Deep inside of him there is a fear and possibly doubts as to whether he is capable of doing and providing for himself. After two or three days of hearing, 'Don't call us, we'll call you' . . . he loses what little self-confidence he has and decides that he has to live and he has to eat no matter what.

"THIS is the deciding point or factor as to whether or not this man will go 'straight' or return to prison in the future."

NEXT: Reidsville's send-off for convicts.

At 80 Hugo Black Looks Ahead

By FRED P. GRAHAM

Today is the 80th birthday of Hugo La Fayette Black, one of the handful of men who have affected the course of the nation by influencing the thought of the Supreme Court.

The milestone has more than sentimental importance, because Justice Black's stature is due to vigor and longevity, as well as to intellectual power. Other giants of the Supreme Court—Marshall, Storey, Holmes, Brandeis—had their talents magnified by long service. But Justice Black's career has been blessed by a special timing.

He could have been remembered as no more than a dissident voice on the complaisant Court of the 1940's and 1950's, but he was granted the luxury of time to develop his philosophy in a series of powerful dissents during that time. Thus he was prepared to become a prophet in his own time when the pendulum swung toward his views in the 1960's, when he was more than three-quarters of a century old.

Last week, as Justice Black chatted informally in his chambers, his remarkable vigor of mind and body dominated the occasion.

Alert Mind

His mind was alert and sharp and he gestured with the strong hands and thick wrists of a man who is not really old. He could stay on the Court until his 90th year—as Holmes had done—and break all present records of service on the Supreme Court by more than five years.

The prospect has interesting overtones. Justice Black's career has been marked by an unusual ebb and flow, and there are those who say he is breaking from the forward-looking philosophy he held as leader of the court in recent years.

Before last year, few would have said this. Justice Black's first decade on the Court had been marked by a broad shift toward liberal positions, with which he had been strongly identified.

At one time he had upheld the power of the Government to intern West Coast Japanese during the war, taken a limited view of the Fourth Amendment's authority to prevent searches and seizures by state officers, concurred in a ruling that the states were not bound by the prohibitions against double jeopardy in the Bill of Rights, and agreed to certain limitations on the

80TH BIRTHDAY: Hugo La Fayette Black, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, marks his 80th year today. During 29 years on the bench he has . . . "stood as a towering and often lonely rallying point for personal right . . . a prophet in his own time."

Brady. Malloy v. Hogan adopted his view that the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination applies to the states. Baker v. Carr, which asserted the Court's jurisdiction over legislative apportionment, had been his dissenting position in Colegrove v. Green.

Finally, in 1965 the Court reversed Adamson v. California, and held that the rule against self-incrimination prohibits a judge or prosecutor from commenting on a defendant's failure to take the stand.

During this period of judicial activism Justice Black, as leader of the majority, gained a reputation as a staunch liberal.

Thus it came as a shock to some when, starting in 1964, he began to dissent with increasing frequency along with the "conservative" justices.

Last term Justice Black dissented 28 times—more than any other justice—and many dissents were in opposition to the "activist" majority. This term he is again numerically well out in front in dissent—often against the liberals.

Justice Black's new orientation probably indicates as well as anything that the issues before the Court are changing. The Bill of Rights has been virtually applied to the states in toto. Congressional rights demonstrators. Last week, in a 30-minute, extemporaneous dissent against the Court's reversal of five Negroes' convictions for staging a "stand-in" at a Louisiana library, he blistered the court for being pro-Negro.

The justices on the majority side responded that the defendants would not have been arrested and before the Court if they were not Negroes. But as the Negroes' struggle has shifted from unequal laws to the more subtle demands for better jobs and educational opportunities, it seems clear that the pro-civil rights majority has left Justice Black behind.

Bitter Dissent

Some say this will erode his liberal position on other isues: His bitter dissent this week impressed some lawyers as inconsistent with his earlier freedom-of-protest stands, and to some it seemed unnecessarily, longwinded and abrasive of other justices' feelings.

But with regard to many other important issues yet to be resolved by the Supreme Court, Justice Black still is firmly in the lead.

He has argued for years that libel and obscenity laws should be voided by the guarantees of the First Amendment. Most legal experts would agree that the trend is in that direction, and that the

Before last year, few would have said this. Justice Black's first decade on the Court had been marked by a broad shift toward liberal positions, with which he had been strongly identified.

At one time he had upheld the power of the Government to intern West Coast Japanese during the war, taken a limited view of the Fourth Amendment's authority to prevent searches and seizures by state officers, concurred in a ruling that the states were not bound by the prohibitions against double jeopardy in the Bill of Rights, and agreed to certain limitations on the right of individuals to parade in the streets, broadcast their views from sound trucks and refuse to salute the flag.

In every case he later repudiated all these positions. This did not embarrass Justice Black, who was never awed by other judges' precedents: as a fledging justice in 1938 he asserted that corporations were not "persons" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, although the Supreme Court had consistently held for 50 years that they were.

By the time of the Truman Administration and the McCarthy era of the 1950's—when the Court's majority repeatedly allowed laws that limited individual freedom to stand—Justice Black stood as a towering, and often lonely rallying point for personal rights.

He was deeply impressed by this experience. He felt that the judges of the nation were too easily swayed by the hysteria of the times, and he developed an answer: his "absolutist" philosophy.

Rights Absolute

This philosophy held that the Bill of Rights should be regarded as absolute prohibitions against the power of the Government to limit certain protected freedoms. By the "Bill of Rights" he meant the first eight Amendments and the individual safeguards contained in the body of the Constitution. But the First Amendment's freedom of speech, press and association have always been the "preferred" freedoms in his scale of values. These were "the heart of our Government," he repeatedly said.

This Bill of Rights theory involved a major snag—the first eight Amendments by their language prohibit only Federal action—not conduct by the states.

But Justice Black had a theory to answer that, and in 1947, when the majority held in Adamson v. California that the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination was not binding on the states, he spelled it out in a monumental 58-page dissent.

His theory was bold and simple: The Fourteenth Amendment—which requires the states to accord all persons "due process"—was intended to incorporate the Bill of Rights into that amendment and make them all binding on the states.

Three justices joined him in this dissent, but in later years he was never able to marshal a majority behind this theory.

However, when younger justices began to move onto the bench in the early 1960's, a majority was created that believed the states should be required to observe many of the safeguards of the Bill of Rights, as an integral part of the due process requirement.

At last, events had overtaken Justice Black's ideas. In a series of momentous decisions, his famous dissents were transformed into some of the outstanding majority decisions of American law.

Gideon v. Wainright, establishing the right to counsel for indigent defendants in state trials, reflected his dissent in Betts v.

[illegible] position in Gategrove v. Green.

Finally, in 1965 the Court reversed Adamson v. California, and held that the rule against self-incrimination prohibits a judge or prosecutor from commenting on a defendant's failure to take the stand.

During this period of judicial activism Justice Black, as leader of the majority, gained a reputation as a staunch liberal.

Thus it came as a shock to some when, starting in 1964, he began to dissent with increasing frequency along with the "conservative" justices.

Last term Justice Black dissented 28 times—more than any other justice—and many dissents were in opposition to the "activist" majority. This term he is again numerically well out in front in dissent—often against the liberals.

Justice Black's new orientation probably indicates as well as anything that the issues before the Court are changing. The Bill of Rights has been virtually applied to the states in toto. Congressional committees and Red-baiters give the court a wide berth. The school prayer controversy has died.

Most noticeably, the Court's role in the Negro revolution has changed. As long as Negroes were being denied equal treatment under the laws, Justice Black's absolutist nature was outraged, and he was a staunch member of the majority that repeatedly struck down this discrimination.

But over the past year and a half he has scolded the majority in a series of dissents against reversals of convictions of Negro civil

The justices on the majority side responded that the defendants would not have been arrested and before the Court if they were not Negroes. But as the Negroes' struggle has shifted from unequal laws to the more subtle demands for better jobs and educational opportunities, it seems clear that the pro-civil rights majority has left Justice Black behind.

He has argued for years that libel and obscenity laws should be voided by the guarantees of the First Amendment. Most legal experts would agree that the trend is in that direction, and that the only question is to what extent the Court will whittle away these laws in future years.

He is still urging the justices to apply to the states the Bill of Rights' provisions on double jeopardy, prosecutions only upon grand jury indictments, speedy trials excessive bails and fines.

In chambers last week Justice Black seemed taken back when someone asked when he might retire. "I haven't thought about it," he said, and the pile of work on the desk before him gave the reason why.

BUNDY TO LEAVE PRESIDENT TODAY

Special Aide Moving Here to Take Ford Fund Post

By MAX FRANKEL
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — McGeorge Bundy, the Administration's custodian of the world, moves to New York tomorrow to become the caretaker of the Ford Foundation's millions.

The President's Special Assistant for National Security believes it is the right time to leave the bureaucratic depths in the White House basement. The rest of Washington believes that in due time he will be reclaimed from the philanthropic heights on Madison Avenue.

"There," said one of his colleagues the other day, "goes a future Secretary of State."

There, in any case, goes one of the most influential figures of Government who, without political mandate or constitutional authority, became the virtual equal of Secretary of State Dean Rusk and Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara.

Dozens of articles have been written here speculating about a successor, or rather a succession arrangement, for hardly anyone expects a similar personality to fit neatly into the job that Mr. Bundy and his two Presidents — John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson — tailored to his talents.

May Not Fill Post

Mr. Johnson has remarked that he may not fill the post. He counts upon intimate dealings with Mr. Rusk and Mr. McNamara and may, as he put it, "do some shifting and changing, promoting, transferring" after Mr. Bundy leaves.

Mr. Bundy' has been a job requiring extraordinary delicacy and vigilance, calling for a funneling of information and problems to the President and a channeling and interpretation of his directives to the huge Govermnent establishment that handles the diplomatic, military, economic, scientific, psychological and intelligence aspects of foreign affairs.

This pivotal management of the processes of decision has made Mr. Bundy's personal role as a leading policy adviser almost a secondary one. His counsel is thought to have had important effects in the evolution of American intervention in Vietnam and in the the post-intervention diplomacy in the Dominican Republic, in earlier confrontations and accommodations with the Soviet Union and in efforts to avert even greater conflict in the Atlantic alliance.

Although one of the most accessible and articulate men in the Administration, Mr. Bundy has also been one of the least visible and least accountable of the leading officials. Many of his specific recommendations and views remain his secrets.

Role in Decision-Making

Much more evident has been his quick, astute and deft regulation of both the ingredients and the expressions of Presidential decision, his arbitration of personal and policy conflicts among the many agencies dealing with foreign affairs, and his selection of problems and crises, with a small but expert staff, for the President's attention.

The New York Times

MOVING HERE TODAY: McGeorge Bundy, new head of the Ford Foundation.

There is no organizational substitute for an alert and effective Presidential staff, Mr. Bundy believes, because problems "come in so many different forms and with so many different lengths and strength of fuse on them."

"Some of them," he told a recent farewell luncheon, "will give such a small pop that it is just as well to let them go off and not bother with them. Some of them are going to give a very big pop but not for another 10 years. A lot of them are going to make a helluva lot of trouble over a 48-hour period and then be forgotten, but there will be very important people concerned in that period."

What matters, he concluded, is not organization but "the skill and energy and activity of individuals."

It was Mr. Bundy's swift skill that have led many to judge him as arrogant, even though his staff testifies to a personal and intellectual tolerance.

One word of caution he would tell a successor is to distinguish between the choices that public officials, and especially personal aides, must offer a President and their own preferences. Presidents, he points out, have an uncanny way of quickly discerning a confusion of the two and of seeking out alternate sources of advice.

Mr. Bundy himself has acquired a reputation here as one of the most facile and persuasive recounters of an argument even when if differs fundamentally from his own.

His talent for cutting to the heart of an issue and cutting off frayed edges of a discussion are expected to make him a sympathetic supporter of a wide variety of Ford-sponsored activities and a formidable barrier to those who seek handouts for projects of fuzzy conception.

Fun-lowing, athletic and a sharp conversationalist, the 46-year-old Mr. Bundy is also expected to become one of the most popular members of New York's managerial establishment. He will live with his wife, the former Mary Buckminister Lothrop, in an apartment on upper Fifth Avenue. They have four sons.

By switching jobs, Mr. Bundy will be increasing his annual salary from $30,000 to $75,000.

He came to Washington a Republican and remained one "with the malicious encouragement of two Presidents," but looks forward to being "a free man" by the time he registers in New York.

SOVIET SPACE DOGS SEEN MOVING ABOUT

MOSCOW, Feb. 27—(UPI)—The Soviet Union's two orbiting space dogs "are feeling well" and can be seen moving in their spacecraft, Tass, the Soviet press agency, reported today.

The dogs, Breeze and Blackie, were launched last Tuesday aboard Cosmos 110.

Dr. Boris Yegorov, reporting on the latest telecast from Cosmos 110 to the Soviet space center, said the experiment was "proceeding successfully and the animals are feeling well," according to Tass.

Dr. Yegorov told Tass that during the telecast, "the dogs could be seen moving in the sputnik's container." Tass did not explain whether he meant they were just moving their heads and paws or were free to walk around.

The announcement said the spacecraft was "equipped for a wide range of radiobiological studies."

MOSCOW, Feb. 27 (Reuters) —Scientists hope to disclose some of the secrets of Venus this week when two Soviet probes hurtle past the planet.

The two automatic stations, Venus 2 and 3, are scheduled to pass on either side of the cloud-shrouded planet.

Lillian Smith, Novelist, Is Dead; 'Strange Fruit' Author Was 68

Interracial Love Story Sold 3-Million Copies — Writer Active in Rights Fight

ATLANTA, Sept. 28 (AP) — Lillian Smith, the novelist and essayist, and an early spokesman for civil rights in the South, died today in a hospital. Her age was 68. She had been ill with cancer for many years.

Miss Smith's first book, the controversial "Strange Fruit," about a tragic love affair between a white boy and a Negro girl, was a best-seller 20 years ago and won her international recognition.

She is survived by three brothers, Frank A. Smith, W. Austin Smith and C. Wallace Smith, and three sisters, Mrs. Eugene E. Barnett, Mrs. Casper S. Peeler and Esther Smith.

Early in Racial Field

"Strange Fruit," published in 1944 by Reynal & Hitchcock, was concerned with lynching in the South; its title implied that Negroes hanging from trees were strange fruit for the trees to be bearing.

Racism, as it concerned the Negro, had not yet become a paramount national issue. The activists in this field had yet to come into prominence. The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was just about entering college. George C. Wallace, later the strongly segregationist Governor of Alabama, was a flight engineer on bombers in the Pacific in World War II. Negroes were in segregated units in the armed services.

"Strange Fruit" was rejected by seven publishers, although most of them said it was interesting. The eighth publisher accepted it immediately. It sold around 3-million copies in the United States without benefit of book clubs and was translated into 15 languages.

"Strange Fruit" told of the love of a Georgia Negro girl for a white man. In the novel a Negro is burned alive in a ball park for all the town to see. It was banned in Boston and in most of Massachusetts when it was first published

The book became the subject of a test case when Bernard De Voto, the author and editor, arranged with a Cambridge bookseller to purchase the book openly. The case against Mr. De Voto was dismissed, but the bookseller was fined $200. Later the book was sold openly in Massachusetts.

Critics did not find "Strange Fruit" an outstanding literary achievement. Malcolm Cowley wrote: "But she [Miss Smith] has done something in this book that nobody did before here she has shown that lynch-

Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

However, she resigned from the CORE committee last July 5, declaring, "I strongly protest the dangerous and unwise position CORE has taken on the use of violence in effecting racial change." She added that white Americans, because of their inertia or violence, "must carry much of the moral burden" for CORE's new tactics.

Miss Smith also criticized S.N.C.C. In a letter to The Atlanta Constitution she said some young Negroes had been influenced by "a mixed-up mess of 19th-century anarchism and 1930's Communism," but she also praised the members of the organization for their bravery.

Born in Florida Town

In "20th Century Authors," Miss Smith told her own story: "I was born in Jasper, Fla. [in 1897]. There were nine of us who grew up in a big old rambling house set under great oaks heavy with Spanish moss, in a small Florida town just across the Georgia line.

"My mother's people were rice planters near St. Mary's; my father's family were pioneer folk who settled southwest Georgia and helped drive the Seminole Indians into Florida. Both families had had slaves; both thought slavery was wrong."

She recalled that when she had asked in Sunday School about eternity, she was firmly told that she must never raise that question again.

Miss Smith was brought up in a musical home, She threw herself into piano practice in what she termed "that awful way in which a passionate child can give herself."

Taught 3 Years in China

She studied at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and for three years taught music at the Virginia School in Huchow, China. When she returned she became secretary to

Smith, and three sisters, Mrs. Eugene E. Barnett, Mrs. Casper S. Peeler and Esther Smith.

Critics did not find "Strange Fruit" an outstanding literary achievement. Malcolm Cowley wrote: "But she [Miss Smith] has done something in this book that nobody did before her: she has shown that lynching is intimately connected with the life of the whole community; that it explains the whole social order."

In the books that followed "Strange Fruit," Miss Smith did not try to present the racial problem in fiction form. In "Killers of the Dream" she sought for the psychological basis of prejudice. "The Journey" was a story of spiritual development. Both books were praised for their compassion and conviction.

Wrote of South's Tragedy

Writing for the magazine Common Ground, Miss Smith explained her feelings about the race question in the South:

"Segregation, White Supremacy, the Negro's Place, are not words to me, not theories. They are a way of life, a tragic way which I, and others like me, white and Negro, have lived since birth.

"The relationship between the two races has become so intertwined with hate and love and fear and guilt and poverty and greed, with churches and lynching, with attraction and repulsion, that it has taken on the ambivalent qualities, the subtle conflicts of a terrifying illness."

Miss Smith continued to write about the racial struggle in magazines and quarterlies as it gathered momentum in the nineteen-sixties. She assembled a book, "Our Faces—Our Words," dealing with the movement for racial equality. Made up of monologues and photographs, it was published last year. The monologues, in a dozen voices, black and white, state:

"What do we want? Dignity? Pompous, vague, forget it. All I'd better say is that this movement has got my soul to aching. And it hurts. God, how it hurts!"

A Southern-born white girl writes to her father:

"And so I ended up in a Mississippi jail, listening to a dirty, low-down cop talking . . . me, your Vassar-educated summer-camp-trained daughter who loves poetry and philosophy and art and human beings and the excellence that her father told her to always search for. But the search . . . can be dangerous; it takes us to strange places sometimes, doesn't it, Dad?"

Miss Smith gave a helping hand to the organizations carrying on the rights fight. She became a member of the advisory committee of the Congress of Racial Equality and was a friend of the leaders of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

However, she resigned from the CORE committee last July 5, declaring, "I strongly protest the dangerous and unwise position CORE has taken on the use of violence in effecting racial change." She added that white Americans, because of their inertia or violence, "must carry much of the moral burden" for CORE's new tactics.

Miss Smith also criticized S.N.C.C. In a letter to The Atlanta Constitution she said some young Negroes had been influenced by "a mixed-up mess of 19th-century anarchism and 1930's Communism," but she also praised the members of the organization for their bravery.

Born in Florida Town

In "20th Century Authors," Miss Smith told her own story: "I was born in Jasper, Fla. [in 1897]. There were nine of us who grew up in a big old rambling house set under great oaks heavy with Spanish moss, in a small Florida town just across the Georgia line.

"My mother's people were rice planters near St. Mary's; my father's family were pioneer folk who settled southwest Georgia and helped drive the Seminole Indians into Florida. Both families had had slaves; both thought slavery was wrong."

She recalled that when she had asked in Sunday School about eternity, she was firmly told that she must never raise that question again.

Miss Smith was brought up in a musical home, She threw herself into piano practice in what she termed "that awful way in which a passionate child can give herself."

Taught 3 Years in China

She studied at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and for three years taught music at the Virginia School in Huchow, China. When she returned she became secretary to the city manager of a Florida city and played the organ in church.

Next she took over her father's camp for girls, the first such private camp to be opened in Georgia, at Laurel Falls. While she was at the camp she edited and published a magazine, The South Today. It began with 12 pages and 25 subscribers, and grew to a 100-page publication with 10,000 subscribers.

She abandoned the project two years after "Strange Fruit" was published, to devote her entire time to writing. Miss Smith adapted "Strange Fruit" into a play, which opened in New York in 1945. Lewis Nichols wrote in The New York Times:

"It is a disagreeable truth, but Lillian Smith has not made a satisfactory play out of 'Strange Fruit.'"

He called it sprawling and verbose.

Miss Smith never married. She lived on a mountain called Old Screamer a mile and a half from Clayton, Ga. She owned the mountain, site of the girls' camp she had operated many years before. Dorothy Dunbar Bromley wrote of her, noting that "she does not look like a woman who leads a movement."

Face One of Tranquillity

"Slight and soft-spoken, she has in her face the tranquillity of spirit which comes from listening to the pines on the mountaintop," Miss Bromley wrote. "There is nothing of the righteous reformer about her, nothing of the exhibitionist who takes pleasure in shocking."

Miss Bromley noted that Miss Smith dressed smartly and had gray hair, rich blue eyes and an extremely sensitive face.

Miss Smith received many awards for her books and for her leadership in the civil rights movement. A special citation from the National Book Award Committee was awarded to her in 1950 for her "distinguished contribution to letters."

She won the Southern Authors Award in 1950, and the Sidney Hillman Award for magazine writing in 1962. She was a member of the national board of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Miss Smith's lesser books were "Now is the Time," 1955; "One Hour," 1959, and "Memory of a Large Christmas," 1962.

In addition to writing, Miss Smith had taught or lectured at many colleges and universities, including Vassar, Smith, Yale, Harvard, Columbia and Mount Holyoke.

PHILOSOPHY

OUR WORLD TODAY

Difficulty of Defining Human Rights

The claim of men to be born with certain inherent rights which no government may deny is one aspect of an eternal human tendency to distinguish between what is, and what ought to be. The whole concept of "rights" arises from the contention that certain human desires have greater validity than the force of circumstances, and therefore must prevail over them.

Background for article appearing in The Atlanta Journal March 14, 1966.

The modern concept of such rights arises from the Enlightenment of the 17th and 18th centuries, but both the Greeks and the Romans held ideas concerning the existence of natural rights. The Hellenistic philosophical school of Stoics held that the supreme goal of life was the achievement of "virtue," which was to be attained by "living consistently with nature." They held that the fundamental moral principles which underlay the legal systems of different nations were reducible to the dictates of natural law. The Romans associated natural law with the jus gentium, or law of nations, the code of law that regulated the relations of foreigners resident in Rome. It became important in Roman legal theory, which came to recognize a common code regulating the conduct of all peoples, existing beside the individual codes of specific places and times.

DURING the Middle Ages, human rights were identified with the law of God, religion being the all - consuming intellectual interest of the epoch. Christian philosophers such as St. Thomas Aquinas perpetuated this idea, maintaining that natural law was common to all peoples — Christian and non-Christian alike—although Christians, through divine revelation, had an additional guide for their actions.

With the decline of feudalism and the onset of the modern era, the doctrine of natural rights from which our own concept is more directly derived took shape. It was necessary to lay emphasis on natural rights as opposed to divine rights, not to denote any break with divinity, but to distinguish the rights of men from the rights of monarchy. During the Enlightenment the term "divine right" was associated with clerical monopoly and the divine right of kings; therefore it was replaced by a term which avoided the connotation of royal and clerical preroggatives.

HUGO GROTIUS, remembered as the father of international law, in his renowned essay, On the Law of War and Peace (1625), asserted that natural law prescribes the rules of conduct for nations as well as individuals. Both must regulate their affairs according to the dictates of the law of nature, which antedates political law, and is based upon reason. Much of the specific content of his arguments was derived from Biblical and classical sources.

During the Enlightenment, "liberty" was thought of as the release of the individual from governmental oppression. To justify such a release, it was necessary to assume that men were by nature sufficiently rational and good to govern themselves. The essential freedoms that men sought were those that had been most commonly denied them — opinion, economic enterprise, and self-government. To achieve these freedoms, men desired the rights of free speech, worship, and public assembly. To these, John Locke added the right of private ownership of property as one of the most vital innate prerogatives common to all men. In the 18th century, Jean Jacques Rousseau, the leading protagonist of natural rights, supplemented the doctrine with the concept of the social contract. He attempted to reconcile the natural rights of the individual with the need for social unity and cooperation.

THE DOCTRINE of natural rights was used both as cause and justification for the revolutionary movements on the European continent and in the United States in the 18th century. In America the writings of Tom Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and Samuel Adams promoted the growth of the doctrine of natural rights. Classical expressions of it are found in the English Bill of Rights (1689), the American Declaration of Independence (1776), the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen (1789), the bills of rights contained in the various states constitutions, and the first ten amendments of the United States Constitution (1791).

The growth of totalitarian regimes which refuse to recognize the dignity and value of individual human beings has led to a reassertion of natural rights theory, especially in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations (1948). In our own day, such thinkers as Jacques Maritain have seen in natural law a necessary intellectual opposition to totalitarian theories.

THE RIGHTS most in the news today are "civil rights," which is a term more inclusive than "political rights," which might be understood to mean rights devolving from the franchise and which are usually held only by citizens. Civil rights have a legal rather than a philosophical basis, and in this country are thought of as specific rights enumerated in the Federal Constitution: freedom of religion, speech, press, assembly, due process of law, and equal protection under the law.

For the last century, since the Civil War, the chief concern about civil rights has focused on efforts to extend them more fully to Negroes. Civil Rights Acts in 1866, 1870, 1871, and 1875 sought to grant Negroes a political and legal status equal to that of whites. No further Federal legislation in civil rights was passed until the 1957 and 1960 Civil Rights Acts, though other branches of the government had been active. The Supreme Court decisions of 1954 and 1955 declaring unconstitutional racial segregation in public schools and in publicly financed recreation facilities is the most important. The Interstate Commerce Commission banned segregation in public transportation, and a series of executive orders has barred racial and religious discrimination in public housing, in Federal employment practices, and in projects supported by Federal funds.

All in all, recent years have seen two major difficulties arise in the doctrine of natural rights which account for most of the recent controversy. There is the problem of reconciling certain of the enumerated rights which in fulfilment appear to conflict with each other — equality with liberty, for example. Another difficulty — one particularly attacked by Federal action — has been the violation of rights by legislative enactments, such as voting restrictions.

INTRODUCTION

I believe, and profoundly hope, that from this day forth the opponents of social progress can take comfort no longer, for not since the March on Washington has there been such broad sponsorship and enthusiastic support for any undertaking as has been mobilized on behalf of "The Freedom Budget for All Americans."

These forces have not come together to demand help for the Negro. Rather, we meet on a common ground of determination that in this, the richest and most productive society ever known to man, the scourge of poverty can and must be abolished—not in some distant future, not in this generation, but within the next ten years!

The tragedy is that the workings of our economy so often pit the white poor and the black poor against each other at the bottom of society. The tragedy is that groups only one generation removed from poverty themselves, haunted by the memory of scarcity and fearful of slipping back, step on the fingers of those struggling up the ladder.

And the tragedy is that not only the poor, the nearly poor, and the once poor, but all Americans, are the victims of our failure as a nation to distribute democratically the fruits of our abundance. For, directly or indirectly, not one of us is untouched by the steady spread of slums, the decay of our cities, the segregation and overcrowding of our public schools, the shocking deterioration of our hospitals, the violence and chaos in our streets, the idleness of able-bodied men deprived of work, and the anguished demoralization of our youth.

For better or worse, we are one nation and one people. We shall solve our problems together or together we shall enter a new era of social disorder and disintegration.

What we need is an overall plan of attack.

This is what the "Freedom Budget" is. It is not visionary or utopian. It is feasible. It is concrete. It is specific. It is quantitative. It talks dollars and cents. It sets goals and priorities. It tells how these can be achieved. And it places the responsibility for leadership with the Federal Government, which alone has the resources equal to the task.

The "Freedom Budget" is not a call for a handout. It is a challenge to the best traditions and possibilities of America. It is a call to those who have grown weary of slogans and gestures to rededicate themselves to the cause of social reconstruction. It is a plea to men of good will to give tangible substance to long-proclaimed ideals.

FOREWORD

After many years of intense struggle in the courts, in legislative halls, and on the streets, we have achieved a number of important victories. We have come far in our quest for respect and dignity. But we have far to go.

The long journey ahead requires that we emphasize the needs of all America's poor, for there is no way merely to find work, or adequate housing, or quality-integrated schools for Negroes alone. We shall eliminate slums for Negroes when we destroy ghettos and build new cities for all. We shall eliminate unemployment for Negroes when we demand full and fair employment for all. We shall produce an educated and skilled Negro mass when we achieve a twentieth century educational system for all.

This human rights emphasis is an integral part of the Freedom Budget and sets, I believe, a new and creative tone for the great challenge we yet face.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference fully endorses the Freedom Budget and plans to expend great energy and time in working for its implementation.

It is not enough to project the Freedom Budget. We must dedicate ourselves to the legislative task to see that it is immediately and fully achieved. I pledge myself to this task and will urge all others to do likewise. The Freedom Budget is essential if the Negro people are to make further progress. It is essential if we are to maintain social peace. It is a political necessity. It is a moral commitment to the fundamental principles on which this nation was founded.

A "FREEDOM BUDGET" FOR ALL AMERICANS

The Freedom Budget is a practical, step-by-step plan for wiping out poverty in America during the next 10 years.

It will mean more money in your pocket. It will mean better schools for your children. It will mean better homes for you and your neighbors. It will mean clean air to breathe and comfortable cities to live in. It will mean adequate medical care when you are sick.

So where does the "Freedom" come in?

For the first time, everyone in America who is fit and able to work will have a job. For the first time, everyone who can't work, or shouldn't be working, will have an income adequate to live in comfort and dignity. And that is freedom. For freedom from want is the basic freedom from which all others flow.

This nation has learned that it must provide freedom for all if any of us is to be free. We have learned that half-measures are not enough. We know that continued unfair treatment of part of our people breeds misery and waste that are both morally indefensible and a threat to all who are better off.

As A. Philip Randolph put it: "Here in these United States, where there can be no economic or technical excuse for it, poverty is not only a private tragedy but, in a sense, a public crime. It is above all a challenge to our morality."

The Freedom Budget would make that challenge the lever we can grasp to wipe out poverty in a decade.

Pie in the sky?

Not on your life. Just simple recognition of the fact that we as a nation never had it so good. That we have the ability and the means to provide adequately for everyone. That simple justice requires us to see that everyone—white or black; in the city or on the farm; fisherman or mountaineer—may have his share in our national wealth.

The moral case for the Freedom Budget is compelling.

In a time of unparalleled prosperity, there are 34 million Americans living in poverty. Another 28 million live just on the edge, with income so low that any unexpected expense or loss of income could thrust them into poverty.

Almost one-third of our nation lives in poverty or want. They are not getting their just share of our national wealth.

Just as compelling, this massive lump of despair stands as a threat to our future prosperity. Poverty and want breed crime, disease and social unrest. We need the potential purchasing and productive power the poor would achieve, if we are to continue to grow and prosper.

In short, for good times to continue—and get better—we must embark immediately on a program that will fairly and indiscriminately provide a decent living for all Americans.

The Freedom Budget provides seven basic objectives, which taken together will achieve this great goal within 10 years. They are:

1. To provide full employment for all who are willing and able to work, including those who need education or training to make them willing and able.
2. To assure decent and adequate wages to all who work.
3. To assure a decent living standard to those who cannot or should not work.
4. To wipe out slum ghettos and provide decent homes for all Americans.
5. To provide decent medical care and adequate educational opportunities to all Americans, at a cost they can afford.
6. To purify our air and water and develop our transportation and natural resources on a scale suitable to our growing needs.
7. To unite sustained full employment with sustained full production and high economic growth.

WHAT WE HAVE TO WORK WITH
Gross National Product in Billions of 1964 Dollars

The Freedom Budget shows how to do all this without a raise in taxes and without a single make-work job—by planning prudently NOW to use the economic growth of the future, and with adequate attention to our international commitments.

The key is jobs.

We can all recognize that the major cause of poverty could be eliminated, if enough decently paying jobs were available for everyone willing and able to work. And we can also recognize that, with enough jobs for all, a basic cause of discrimination among job-seekers would automatically disappear.

What we must also recognize is that we now have the means of achieving complete employment—at no increased cost, with no radical change in our economic system, and at no cost to our present national goals—if we are willing to commit ourselves totally to this achievement.

That is what the Freedom Budget is all about.

It asks that we unite in insisting that the nation plan now to use part of its expected economic growth to eliminate poverty.

Where will the jobs come from? What will we use for money?

If all our nation's wealth were divided equally among all us Americans, each share would be worth roughly $3,500. Of this, we grant to the Federal government a slice equal to roughly $500 in the form of taxes, leaving us an average of about $3,000 to spend on our other needs.

If our nation's productivity continues growing at the same rate as in recent years—and it will if the Freedom Budget is adopted—each share will grow to about $5,000. Thus, the Federal government's slice will grow to $700, with the present Federal tax structure, and we will still have $4,300 left for our other needs.

What the Freedom Budget proposes is this: Budget a fraction of the $200 increase in Federal tax revenues to provide jobs for all who can work and adequate income of other types for those who cannot.

No doles. No skimping on national defense. No tampering with private supply and demand.

Just an enlightened self-interest, using what we have in the best possible way.

By giving the poor a chance to become dignified wage earners, we will be generating the money to finance the improvements we all need—rich and poor alike. And we would be doing it by making new jobs with new money, so that no one who is now earning his own living would suffer.

The Freedom Budget recognizes that the Federal government must take the lead in attaining the eradication of poverty.

The Federal government alone represents all 200 million American individuals. It alone has the resources for a comprehensive job. And it has the responsibility for fulfilling the needs which are the basis for the Freedom Budget plan.

First, here's where the jobs would be coming from:

—Right now, the nation should begin budgeting to replace the 9.3 million "seriously deficient" housing units that make living in them a misery and form slums that are a blight upon our land.

The housing program contained in the Freedom Budget would have practically all Americans decently housed by 1975—while providing a wide range of jobs for the unemployed in housing construction and urban redevelopment.

—Critical shortages of water and power persist in many highly populated areas. Air and waters remain polluted. Recreation facilities are unavailable for those who need them most.

The Freedom Budget proposes the creation of millions of jobs in a program that will correct these pressing problems.

—We need, at a conservative estimate, 100,000 new public classrooms a year for the next six years, as well as considerable expansion of our institutions of higher learning.

Only the Federal government can meet the largest share of these needs, as well as providing for the hundreds of thousands of new teachers who also will be needed.

—We must double our rate of hospital construction if we are to keep up with our minimum requirements in this field, and we must expand rehabilitation and outpatient facilities.

As these and other programs swell the number of productive workers, cut down unemployment and increase consumption, the private sector of our national economy will inevitably grow also.

The Freedom Budget recognizes that full employment by itself is not enough to eradicate poverty. Therefore, it also proposes — and budgets for — a $2-an-hour Federal minimum wage covering everyone within Federal jurisdiction; a new farm program to provide adequate income to the 43 per cent of farm families who now live in poverty; and immediate improvements in Social Security, welfare, unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation and other programs designed to support those who cannot or should not work.

Where will the money come from?

The Freedom Budget recognizes that we cannot spend what we do not produce. It also recognizes that we must spend wisely what we do produce.

It proposes that a portion of our future growth—one thirteenth of what can reasonably be expected to be available —be earmarked for the eradication of poverty. The Freedom Budget proposed outlay of $185 billion in 10 years sounds like a great deal of money, and it is a great deal of money.

But it will come from the expansion of our economy that will in part be the result of wise use of that very $185 billion. It will build homes and schools, provide recreation areas and hospitals. It will train teachers and nurses.

It will provide adequate incomes to millions who now do not have them. And those millions will in turn buy goods they cannot now buy.

So the wage earner of today will benefit as well. His earnings will go up and his enjoyment of life will be increased. The opportunities for private enterprise will increase.

The breeding grounds of crime and discontent will be diminished in the same way that draining a swamp cuts down

WHAT THE FREEDOM BUDGET MEANS FOR FAMILY INCOMES
Number of Families (millions)

the breeding of mosquitoes, and the causes of discrimination will be considerably reduced.

But the Freedom Budget cannot become reality without a national effort. It requires a concentrated commitment by all the people of America, expressed in concrete goals and programs of the Federal Government. These goals and programs must encourage to the utmost the efforts of state and local governments and private enterprise.

It is not lack of good-will that has prevented the achievement of these great goals in the past. All of us, 200 million strong, are united in our willingness to share the abundance of America in equal impartiality with our fellows, and to grant equal opportunities to all.

What we must do—and what the Freedom Budget provides—is to express that will in the most direct, quickest and fairest way.

The Freedom Budget, then, is a new call to arms for a final assault on injustice. It is a rallying cry we cannot fail to heed.

THE "FREEDOM BUDGET": QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

1. Aren't We Making Progress in Eliminating Poverty Through the Kind of Sharp Economic Growth We've Had in the Past Two Years? What New Dimensions Does the "Freedom Budget" Add?

There is no evidence that the economic growth of the last two years has significantly dented poverty. Economic growth is a precondition for abolishing poverty, but it is not sufficient by itself. To it must be added programs that reach toward a more equitable distribution of our abundance. This is the dimension added by the "Freedom Budget."

2. Will Programs to Help the Poor Really Enable Them to Break the Cycle of Poverty?

Of course. The overwhelming majority of the poor don't want to be poor. They have been kept in poverty, in some cases for two or more generations. They are the victims of technological changes, of wrong-headed economic policies, of political powerlessness, of discrimination, of the environment of poverty itself. Their despair and demoralization can be dispelled only by the opening of genuine economic opportunity. When such opportunity is provided, along the lines suggested in the "Freedom Budget," the cycle of poverty can and will be broken.

3. How Many of the People in Poverty Are Capable of Handling Jobs and How Many Would Take Jobs if They Were Offered?

First of all, 20% of those in poverty are in families whose breadwinners already work full-time but at wages below the poverty level. Another 40% are victims of unemployment or underemployment; their problem is not unwillingness to work but the absence of jobs. Thus, fully 60% of the poverty problem could be eliminated if we achieved full employment at decent wages.

The remaining 40% of those in poverty either cannot or should not be working. Included are the physically disabled, the elderly, women with young children, etc. For them the "Freedom Budget" demands improved public assistance, social security and other payments, culminating in a guaranteed annual income.

Our past experience shows that federal programs such as the progressive income tax, social security, protection of collective bargaining and others have raised the income level of millions of people.

4. Won't the Spending of So Much Money Mean the Creation of More Government Agencies and Just Expand Bureaucracy?

The expansion of bureaucracy results from the effort to solve problems in a haphazard, piecemeal way. A coordinated national plan, such as the "Freedom Budget" does not call for new agencies; it calls for new levels of economic performance. People who are fully employed at decent wages do not need bureaucracies; the poor and disadvantaged do.

5. Will Taxes Have to be Raised to Provide the Money to Implement the Freedom Budget Programs?

Our current tax structure is very responsive to economic growth. If total output expands—and it will if Freedom Budget proposals are enacted—revenues to the federal government will rise by $10 billion each year. For the ten years, the cumulative effect will be to add in excess of $400 billion to our present tax revenue.

6. Where Will All the Money Come From?

From what the "Freedom Budget" calls the "economic growth dividend." If we put all of our resources to work, the country's total production will jump from $663 billion in 1965 to roughly $1.2 trillion in 1975. To reach this figure, the gross national product would rise each year by an average of $244 billion. Thus, over a ten-year period, the aggregate increase in the gross national product would be $2.4 trillion higher than if the economy remained at its present level. (See graph, p. 10) This is what is meant by "economic growth dividend." At present tax rates, such a dividend would result in an additional $400 billion or more in Federal revenues over the next decade. It is from these additional revenues that the "Freedom Budget" proposes the allocation of $185 billion to meet our critical social needs.

7. Aren't We Asking the American Public to Devote a Tremendous Amount of Money to Help Just a Small Group Within Our Society?

While it is true that poverty afflicts only a minority of Americans, it reflects a malfunctioning of our national economy which affects all Americans. The persistence of unemployment and underuse of resources detract from our total wealth. Had there been maximum employment and production between 1953-65, as would have been achieved under programs such as those proposed in the Freedom Budget, our gross national product would have been $550 billion higher, total private consumption would have been $364 billion higher, and public revenues would have been $135 billion higher. All Americans would have shared in this greater abundance.

Thus, we have all been deprived of the contribution the poor can make, as producers and consumers, to our economy. Moreover, nobody is untouched by the spread of slums, the decay of social services, and the human waste that lead to violence, crime and chaos. Every American suffers from outmoded urban transit, air and water pollution, inadequate schools and hospitals.

This is a "Freedom Budget" for all Americans.

8. Would Not a $2.00 Minimum Wage, Particularly in Agriculture, Reduce the Number of Jobs?

This is a standard argument against higher minimum wages, but it has no basis in fact. There was no increase in unemployment when minimum wages were raised in 1961 and again in 1963. On the contrary, because a $2.00 minimum wage would boost consumer purchasing power, total employment would probably rise.

Government programs should be established to help small enterprises achieve greater efficiency and to tide them over while they are adjusting to payment of a living wage.

9. Won't $185 Billion More in Spending Create Such High Demand for Goods and Services That Sharp Inflation Will Be Inevitable?

There is no evidence of serious shortages in goods at present. Should such shortages develop, however, or if tendencies toward inflation threaten, the "Freedom Budget" contends that the Federal Government has sufficient fiscal and monetary tools to deal with the problem, without scuttling our commitment to abolish poverty.

10. Does the "Freedom Budget" Assume That National Defense Expenditures Would Not Rise?

No. For national defense, space technology and all international outlays, the federal budget in 1967 was $64.6 billion. The "Freedom Budget" assumes this figure would rise to $87.5 billion in 1975.

In making this estimate, the Freedom Budget neither endorses nor condemns present military spending policies. It relies on the judgment of informed experts. Obviously, if the international situation improves and a reduction in military spending is in order, so much more money will be available for social needs. But even if military spending increases faster than now envisioned, the Freedom Budget proves that we can afford to carry out the necessary programs. But the abolition of poverty is too precious a goal to be made contingent on such a reduction.

SIGNATORIES OF "FREEDOM BUDGET"*

The "Freedom Budget" embodies a fundamental approach to the elimination of poverty for all Americans, regardless of color, and has other essential purposes. While not necessarily endorsing every detail, I am in broad agreement with its basic objectives and broad outlines.
